VOLUME XXVIII, PART II.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

With reference to the first proposition, let me call attention to the fact that while this resolution of ours, or the one reported by the committee, is not termed a protest, yet, as a matter of fact, it is a protest against the negligence of certain nations who are parties to a treaty in allowing the provisions of that treaty to be uncomplied with or unenforced. It is a protest, and I suggest that my resolution is simply a method of intensifying that protest—of giving emphasis to our protest at these murderous outrages. The President is requested, or directed, to act. That is our method of giving additional emphasis, and our resolution is nothing more than an attempt to be emphatic where emphasis is most essential.

Gentlemen have told us—the gentleman from Kentucky told us directly—that the resolutions reported by the committee are absolutely meaningless; that they are not expected to have any effect; that it is only by the "barest possibility," quoting the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], that beneficial results can come from this effort, in other words, these gentlemen expect this protest, mild and kindly as it is, so diplomatic, so in harmony with all that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been lately accustomed to do, so polite, that these resolutions would not challenge the attention of anybody. Now, what I want to do is to emphasize the protest of the American Congress, and to compel those Governments to think for a moment, or at least to compel the attention of the people of those nations so that there shall be something done in the way of agitation.

If the resolutions pass as the committee have reported them, it will be said, "Nothing will be done; they are meaningless." Gentlemen, advocates in the House of Representatives, have explained that nothing is to come of them; that they are to be barren of results, and so, no action being expected to result, there will not be any occasion in England even for examining them. But if it is understood that we are in earnest, and we are so in earnest that we refuse diplomatic relations with the murderers, that we are so in earnest that we will not recognize as civilized this offending nation, that very fact will challenge attention everywhere, and will challenge discussion everywhere. The enormities will be brought to the knowledge of all mankind, and humanity, revolting against those outrages, will compel silent Governments to speak.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not sure whether I can answer it.

Mr. ADAMS. If we should break off diplomatic relations with Turkey, who is going to take care of the American citizens there now? If we should dismiss their minister, they would do the same with our minister.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman bases his inquiry on the error that he committed when he announced a moment ago that the adoption of this resolution, or the handing of passports to a minister, was a declaration of war. I deny it. It might be an offense, and such an offense as would justify the nation supposed to be wronged in a declaration of war; but it is not one on our part——

Mr. BOWERS. We sent the English minister home.

Mr. HEPBURN. As the gentleman urged when he made that statement.

Mr. QUIGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether this discussion is intended to enlighten the Chair upon the point of order or not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have not the happy faculty of the gentleman from New York of always being direct and always saying just the thing I want to say in the best possible English, but in my own weak way I am trying to enlighten the Chair, if it is possible for me to do so. [Laughter.]

Again, Mr. Speaker, the amendment is germane, even to the portion of the resolution cited by the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman [Mr. MCCREARY] read this:

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring) will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

Now, I do not see that it can be claimed that the method I have proposed in this amendment is not one of the methods that the House proposes to pledge itself to sustain the President in. He might, without these resolutions, have adopted this very course. The amendment simply suggests to him, as the sense of the Congress, that this is one of the methods that he ought to pursue looking to the suppression of these outrages.

The SPEAKER. While the matter is not free from doubt, the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] is recognized.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I have two minutes remaining, and in that time I desire to call the attention of the House to the serious character of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. When a man is doing something in his own household which you do not like, there are two ways, and two only, in which you can stop him. One is by asking him not to do it, and the other is by forcing him not to do it. The remedy that I propose, which certainly is suitable in the first instance, is that we shall ask him not to do it. The gentleman from Iowa does not propose the other remedy; what he proposes is that we shall insult him. The question for us is: Who is going to suffer most—Turkey or the United States—by the adoption of the course which the gentleman from Iowa proposes? Turkey will not suffer by our having nothing to do with her here in Washington. It is nothing to Turkey that we send her minister home. We are the ones that will suffer; for when the Turkish minister leaves this capital our minister and nine consuls will leave Constantinople and Asia Minor, and 900 American citizens and all the property of the missionaries that are being held back from slaughter and destruction by the efforts of the American minister and of our consuls will be at the mercy of people whom, in the remoter regions of Asia Minor, we know the Government of Turkey might not under such circumstances be able to control, even if it wanted to control them.

Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question on the resolutions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him one question.

The SPEAKER. It will require the consent of the House.

Mr. QUIGG. I will answer the gentleman if I have the time. Mr. Speaker, I think we have had sufficient debate on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But it has been all on one side.

Mr. COX. I only want to ask the gentleman one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] asks for the previous question.

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the gentleman from New York to permit me to ask unanimous consent that there be half an hour allowed for further debate on this proposition, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. COX. That is all right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The affirmative side of this proposition has occupied nearly the whole time, and gentlemen on that side have even refused to allow us to ask unanimous consent, a thing never before done on this floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now ask unanimous consent for both sides.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But there must be a fair division of the time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection to the time being extended beyond a half an hour if there are gentlemen who desire to speak.

A MEMBER. Make it an hour.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that one hour longer be allowed for debate on the resolutions, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, half an hour to be given to each side.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let the division be a little different, Mr. Speaker. Let our side have forty minutes of the hour and the other side twenty minutes. Even then the time will hardly be equalized; advantage will still be with the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Which is "our side"?

Mr. HARDY. Let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] control the time on his side.

Mr. QUIGG. Let us not depart from the original proposition of the gentleman from Maine. Let the time be divided evenly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Be fair about it. Give us forty minutes.

Mr. QUIGG. All right. Let it be understood, then, that the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that the vote shall be taken on the resolutions and on the amendment at the end of the hour.

Mr. CANNON. How is the time to be divided—half and half?

Mr. QUIGG. No; the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] wants forty minutes, and so far as I am concerned (assuming that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is in accord with me), I say let us agree that he shall have it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered and a vote be taken one hour from the present time, the intervening time to be spent in debate, forty minutes of which shall be under the control of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and twenty minutes under the control of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG].

Mr. BAILEY. Before unanimous consent is given we on this side would like to have some understanding that we shall be fairly treated in the division of the time. With such an understanding from the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from New York, we shall make no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My colleague [Mr. TAFT], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, desires to offer an amendment to the pending resolution. I ask that he be allowed to present such an amendment and have it voted on under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the request for unanimous consent to be agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not hear the proposition put by the Chair. I was reading the proposed amendment of my colleague. I think it is no more than fair that he should have an opportunity to offer that amendment, to be voted on under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. QUIGG. I have not yet understood the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. My colleague, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, desires to offer an amendment. I suggest that he be permitted to do so, the amendment to be voted on under the previous question, without any extension of the time already agreed upon, as I understand, for debate. The simple request is that he be given an opportunity to offer this amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. Has consent been given to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

The SPEAKER. Consent has not yet been given, the gentleman from Ohio having presented an additional request.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not know what the amendment is. I should not like to agree to admit the proposition without knowing what it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It comes from a member of your own committee.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order. This discussion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered and that the next hour be spent in debate, forty minutes to be under the control of the gentleman from Iowa, and twenty minutes under the control of the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was not ordered.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio that he may offer his amendment.

Mr. TAFT. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the conscience of humanity fastens upon the six Christian powers above named the responsibility of the continuance of the butchery of Armenian Christians; that the spectacle of these six leading Christian powers permitting the murder of Christians who by treaty stipulations were placed under their special care is humiliating to the last degree and discredits the Christian religion throughout the world.

Resolved, That that one of the signatory powers which first takes action under the Berlin treaty to prevent the further butchery of defenseless Armenian Christians will receive the grateful recognition not only of the American people, but of the entire civilized world.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Ohio offers this as a substitute.

Mr. COX. I should like to have that amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is offered as a substitute for the whole resolution.

Mr. TAFT. No, sir; it is simply an amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to understand the purpose of the gentleman.

Mr. TAFT. My purpose is this: We are criticising the Turks. Now, it seems to me that the people who ought to be criticised——

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to know whether the gentleman offers this as an amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. TAFT. I offer it as an amendment to the entire set of resolutions and to your amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then it is an addition?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] offers his proposition as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. TAFT. My purpose was to offer it as an amendment to all the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. As additional?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then it would not be in order until the other amendment is disposed of.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to withdraw my objection to the printing of additional remarks by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE].

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he be allowed to extend his remarks?

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN) there were—ayes 19, noes 121.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I desire to say a few words only on the grave and serious considerations which this resolution suggests.

I was absent from the Hall in another place when this measure came up for consideration, and during the debate which followed. I am, therefore, not aware of all of the incidents which have transpired in respect to it, but I want to express my great gratification and pleasure at the very admirable and conservative tone exhibited by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in his colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa. I may be permitted to express, however, my deepest regret that while he opposes the extreme proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], he has nevertheless given his sanction to the Senate resolution which is now pending before the House.

Our wise forefathers committed our foreign relations and our delicate diplomatic affairs to a confidential channel, in which they are conducted by the President and the Senate. They carefully endeavored to isolate these questions from the temptations and emergencies of party politics, which too often overmaster and dominate us all.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the policy—the constitutional policy—to which I have adverted has been departed from in some degree in this instance. There is, I know, in this country what I may without giving offense call a sort of Christian clamor against the Turkish Government, against which, natural as it is, the best of us are scarcely able to stand.

But it seems to me, sir, that this question presents itself: Is it wise, is it prudent, is it dignified in the high forum of international ethics and comity for us to intrude in this foreign quarrel and in this manner? In addition to this constitutional policy to which I have already adverted, we have also established another great principle of American policy, the converse of that which has been called the Monroe doctrine. We have agreed, following the great precedent established by Washington himself, that we would keep out of entangling alliances on the other side of the ocean; and yet on an occasion arising out of a treaty between European nations—the treaty of Berlin—in which, indeed, sir, we would have declined to participate, we are proposing to intervene in violation of our public policy thus established and ordained from our most ancient times and undertake to declare to the signatories to that great treaty, not only what is the proper construction of it, but the duty of those who entered into it.

In other words, sir, we will not, ourselves, undertake entangling alliances with those countries, but will thrust ourselves into the quarrel and call on them to fulfill our construction of the treaty. We decline the responsibilities which other nations are at liberty to undertake. Shall we presume to advise or direct them in the performance of their mutual duties and covenants? It is a plain violation of the noble advice of the Father of his Country. I say it is an impertinence on our part. It is foreign to the comity which should prevail among the nations of the world, and it ignores conditions prevailing among themselves with which they are far more familiar than we are at this distance. The countries that signed that treaty are themselves Christian powers. Shall we arrogate to ourselves that superiority of Christian grace and sympathy which will entitle us to tell them what their duty is, and how they must do it?

Why, sir, looking further at this matter, let it be remembered that these great powers undertook by that famous treaty to effectuate a pacification of the Eastern nations, which for ages have been engaged in the terrific conflicts between the followers of Christ and those of Mohammed, an international and imperial undertaking which ought to add imperishable fame to Lord Beaconsfield and his illustrious associates in that mighty enterprise of piety, peace, and humanity; and we ought not to forget that the gravest complications growing out of recent wars and their bitter results, jealousies as to the balance of power, and mutual fears in the face of the insatiable militarism which holds Europe in its grasp, embarrass the orderly execution of the compact made at Berlin. The great armies and armaments of Russia; the mighty military establishments of Germany and France, of Austria and England, with the consequent lust of power and dominion, what would they do with Turkey if they were to undertake to subdue that country. They seem, in fact, to be fully occupied just now in watching each other. A spark in the present temper of Europe might kindle a flame which would appall mankind!

Do we regard ourselves as wiser and better than the statesmen who are keeping the peace in Europe?

Will not our interposition under these most extraordinary circumstances be regarded as a rash and unjustifiable intrusion?

The last of these resolutions declares to the world and the Turkish Government that whatever the President may do, whatever step he may take for the protection of American citizens in Armenia shall meet with our sanction and our support. How far, Mr. Speaker, does that resolution fall short of a declaration of war? He might send the American Navy to bombard the whole Turkish coast, to lay Constantinople in ruins, and level it with the waters of the sea. I have no doubt of the wisdom and conservatism of the honorable gentleman who occupies that high position; but I would not, under the conditions which now exist, charge him with such a menace.

Shall we, sir, in the midst of the perils which now beset our path, a very recent incident of which has just vibrated all round the world, load the President and ourselves with new duties and responsibilities outside of this hemisphere? Shall we constitute ourselves universal guardians of mankind? Shall we set the example here, Mr. Speaker, of thrusting the discussion of grave foreign and diplomatic questions into the arena of politics and making them the spoil of a political campaign during this eventful year? We are to make platforms this year, sir. We are to have candidates for the Presidency. We are to settle great questions of domestic interest and policy. Shall we inject into this mighty contention of party the gravest and most solemn questions of peace and war that could concern mankind throughout the world?

Mr. Speaker, I could not permit this occasion to pass without asking gentlemen to pause and reflect before that step is taken. A political campaign is not a proper means by which to settle these great and delicate duties and difficulties among nations. If this step is taken to-day, we will be fighting over it in this country the rest of the year, embroiling our people with all the world. Our great mission is peace. If I had my way, Mr. Speaker, I would lay the resolution on the table until there could be more reflection and investigation than we have been able to give to this momentous subject. What grievance, sir, have we as a people against "the Unspeakable Turk," as he has been recently designated? Our State Department has been doing its full duty. We have at the Turkish court a minister whose efficiency and vigilance have received world-wide recognition. He has more influence with the Sultan than any other foreign minister. Not a single American missionary or American citizen has ever been molested or injured by the Kurds.

On the contrary, I am informed that supreme effort has been made by the Turkish Government to jealously guard and protect every American citizen. It is true that some property has there been destroyed—I believe the property of an American college. I will gladly yield for a correction if I am wrong; but I understand that that Government eagerly offers to pay us for the damage, and to reinstate the property. Therefore, so far as our immediate relations to that Government are concerned, we not only have no grievance, but we have to recognize that we are under peculiar obligations to that country for special and particular protection to American citizens and American property. The only question which remains for me to discuss is humane concern for what are called the Armenian Christians. That interest we can safely leave to the executive department in the orderly course of diplomatic intercourse, even resorting to protest and remonstrance if deemed useful or necessary under the laws of nations. Let us take care that we do not endanger our own citizens by inflaming the Kurdish fanatics, nor make still harder the fate of Armenian Christians.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have already addressed the House on the pending resolutions, and I should not again speak but for the importance of the resolutions that are now being considered. I have, Mr. Speaker, the greatest respect for my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. I am in the habit of listening to and respecting his views on almost every subject; but I believe the gentleman has unintentionally exaggerated the force and scope of the concurrent resolutions. If I believed that there was any "impertinent intrusion" in these resolutions which have already unanimously, as I am informed, passed the Senate, I should not be in favor of them. These are important times—times when we should be careful—but whenever we are acting in the cause of humanity and justice there is no reason why we should not speak out and announce our views plainly, so that we may be understood not only at home, but also abroad.

We do not in any way criticise what was done when that great treaty of Berlin was adopted, in 1878, between the Ottoman Empire and the nations of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia. We venture simply to say in these resolutions—

That it is an imperative duty in the interest of humanity to express the earnest hope that the European concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its just effect in such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians and as beneficiaries of the explicit provisions of the treaty above recited.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Suppose there was no treaty which this House could ask to have enforced. Then in what way could we make our protest felt by Turkey? In what way could we protest?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If there was no treaty?

Mr. NORTHWAY. If there was no treaty, how would we protest?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It seems to me that we have taken the proper course. We have called upon the powers named.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If there was no treaty, could we protest at all as a nation?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We have called upon the great countries who adopted this treaty to enforce the treaty——

Mr. NORTHWAY. But the gentleman does not answer my inquiry. If there was no such treaty, and such a condition of affairs existed in Turkey as we find now, how could we protest as a nation?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We probably under those circumstances would protest against the condition of things in Turkey and send our protest to the Sultan.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why do we not act directly as a nation?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Because the concurrent resolution refers to the Ottoman Empire, as well as Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia; and it is provided in the concurrent resolution that the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia.

Mr. Speaker, we simply express an earnest hope that the European concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its effect in such a way as shall stay the hands of fanaticism and lawless violence. I see no objection to a declaration of that kind.

The last resolution declares that the—Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring) will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

I see no objection to that resolution. Information has come to us that an American college, built with the capital of philanthropists who are interested in education and in missionary work in Armenia, has been destroyed. Information comes to us that Americans have had to flee for their lives. Is there any just reason why we should not say, as we have often said, that we would support the President in vigorous action if he should see fit to take it to protect American citizens and American property? I have confidence in the President of the United States. I am sure that he will do nothing imprudent or improper in this connection; and I fail to find in these resolutions anything to alarm representatives in Congress or, as was said by my friend from Georgia, that may jeopardize the interests of our party in the great elections that are to come on this year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is necessary to make this protest that he speaks of to Turkey, why not make it direct rather than through the countries he enumerates in the resolution? What is the advantage in favor of that course?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman will read the preamble and resolution he will find that only an earnest hope is expressed with regard to the enforcement of the treaty and of our desire to stay the hand of fanaticism and lawlessness; and the treaty referred to was made by the Ottoman Empire and Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the question I propounded to the gentleman was, why not make our protest direct to Turkey rather than through these different Governments? What advantage is there in that course?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The supplemental treaty of Berlin, which was adopted in 1878, was made by the Ottoman Empire as well as the other great nations I have named, and all parties to the treaty should be addressed.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, in the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] I notice that he laid especial stress upon the fact that we are indebted in a marked degree to the Government of Turkey for "special and particular protection to our citizens." I do not apprehend that the people of this Republic are under any especial obligation to the Turkish or to any other Government for not murdering in cold blood citizens of the United States. Nor should we be grateful to any foreign power for refraining from practicing on American citizens such villainies as may be perpetrated on the defenseless subjects of its own sovereignty. This discussion of the Armenian atrocities is not, as I understand it, a religious question, so far as our intervention is concerned. We would take exactly the same stand, did we fulfill our national duty and our national destiny, whether the victims of these unspeakable and appalling outrages were Jews, or Turks, or devotees of the Hindoo religion, or of any other creed known to men. Our obligation as representatives of this Republic, sitting here in the capital city of a Government which is the representative of civilization and of human progress, instructs us that against these outrages we should protest in the name of general humanity, and not because of any particular class or any particular race or any particular religious profession.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] said that this question, viewed from the standpoint of the signatory powers that participated in the treaty of Berlin, was somewhat in the nature of a contract, in which the obligation concerned only the contracting parties to fulfill or not to fulfill the terms of the agreement; but, if the gentleman from Texas will permit me to observe, there is no contract known to man that will permit either or any of the contracting parties an unlimited license in murder, in brutality, in every conceivable atrocity. [Applause.] International law, in its development, has a tendency to narrow and to crystallize. From time to time great revulsions of human sentiment, great declarations of allegiance to higher principles, sweep aside these crystallizations of outworn conditions and establish new ideas and new phases of thought and action for the government of mankind. And it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the time has arrived for us to state squarely and fairly to the Government of Turkey that we, as a civilized nation, in the forefront of human progress and human enlightenment, will not sit idly by and see these outrages perpetrated without at least lifting a manful voice of protest against them.

There is manhood in nations as well as in individuals. If one of you gentlemen sitting in this Hall—if my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] or my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]—were to see a helpless woman or a defenseless child assaulted upon Pennsylvania avenue and did not raise his voice in protest or offer other resistance to prevent the outrage he would be, in the eyes of the law, a participator in the crime; and I say that as the representatives of the United States sitting here in this magnificent Capitol, dedicated to tolerance and to human liberty, we shall be guilty participators in the Armenian outrages and atrocities if we do not lift our voice in protest against the infinite and unspeakable villainies perpetrated by the Turkish Government. My friends who oppose these resolutions have laid great stress upon the view that it is not our duty to interfere in the domestic concerns of foreign nations and that we ought to keep distinctly to ourselves. Well, my friends, if we let these slaughters pass without protest, if we sit here in suppliance, if we sit here in silence and in cowardice while such wrongs shame the eternal heavens, then everything that we stand for among the Governments of earth, all the national mission and destiny to make for truth and freedom which is the just pride of American citizenship, is but the empty phrasing of still emptier words, and that magnificent statue in the harbor of New York which holds up the light of tolerance and of liberty to all the world is a delusion and a lie.

What the distingusihed gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said is the gist of this whole question. We may with justice and propriety turn aside from the minor considerations of international law and say to the Executive, as the eminent Representative from the State of Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] urges us to say: Give back to the Turkish minister his passports; send him home to the Sublime Porte with the message that the Congress of the freest, the most moral, the most intelligent, and the most tolerant country on earth protests against his outrages on defenseless women and helpless children, and that we want no fraternity with a man or a sovereign whose hands are dripping with the gore of the innocent. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer, by way of amendment, the resolutions which I will now read:

Resolved, That the conscience of humanity fastens upon the six Christian powers above named the responsibility of the continuance of the butchery of Armenian Christians; that the spectacle of these six leading Christian powers permitting the murder of Christians who by treaty stipulations were placed under their special care is humiliating to the last degree and discredits the Christian religion throughout the world.

Resolved, That the one of the signatory powers which first takes action under the Berlin treaty to prevent the further butchery of defenseless Armenian Christians will receive the grateful recognition not only of the American people but of the entire civilized world.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make any remarks upon these amendments at this time. I should adopt everything that has been said by my friend from New York [Mr. QUIGG] and by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] in regard to the necessity of passing these resolutions; but it seems to me that in criticising the Turk we are letting escape the powers that are really responsible for these outrages. For this reason my amendments bring home the responsibility to these powers, and if any one of the signatory powers will take the first step to put a stop to these atrocities that power ought to receive the grateful recognition of our people.

Mr. GROSVENOR was recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds the Chair will ask his colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], who proposes an amendment, to send it up in order that it may be read from the Clerk's desk.

The amendment offered by Mr. TAFT was again read as above.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, we seem to have reached a stage in this debate where we have three lines of opinion before us for consideration; one of them apparently represented by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], protesting, in substance, against all action by this House or by this country; another, the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in which I most cordially concur, and the third represented by the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I want to speak a few words on the subject of this report and the particular attitude in which it will put the House if the report should be adopted, as I understand it will be by a very large majority.

What is alleged in this preamble to justify the interference of the United States of America in this matter in any way whatever? I take it that the stream of the resolution will not rise above the source of the preamble, and if that be so, then we put ourselves in one of the most awkward, absurd, and ridiculous positions ever assumed by a legislative body, and we place ourselves there because of a shuddering, shivering cowardice on the part of this legislative body to speak the sentiments of the American people, to speak the sentiments of Christian civilization, and to open our mouths in protest against the unspeakable crimes which have been recited.

If it be true that in all this devastation, in all this storm of murder in which 30,000 lives have been sacrificed, no citizen of the United States has been affected, why should we speak? If the United States or any of its citizens have been affected by some act of Turkey, why not say so? What is there about the Turkish character, the Turkish Government, the Turkish nation, that should demand of the people of the United States silence in the face of the awful reports that come to us, undenied, of the brutality and criminality of that nation as a nation? And yet the committee has reported a series of preambles and asks us to act upon them affirmatively, dodging every question that would offend "the Unspeakable Turk."

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman from Ohio point to a single instance in which any American citizen has been treated improperly or his property treated improperly in that country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not here on that business. I can not understand the pertinency of that remark. If what the gentleman intimates be true, I am coming to that question, and I am saying that if it shall be true, then we have nothing to do with the subject-matter.

Mr. COX. I am agreeing with the gentleman all along the line.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; but you will not agree with me after a little while. [Laughter.] We will come to the forks of the road directly.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman point to an instance of any American citizen who has been treated improperly over there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not pertinent to my present inquiry.

Mr. COX. I thought it was pertinent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, it is not. It will be later on. I am talking, Mr. Speaker, about the report of the committee. I am challenging that committee to tell us this: If no citizen of the United States has been despoiled in property or limb or life, upon what ground do you place our interference?

Mr. COX. That is my question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The committee have been exceedingly careful; they have been so careful and delicate that they might have traveled into this House with this report stepping on eggs and damaging no property by doing so. We not only find, Mr. Speaker, that no allegation is made against Turkey, but that we are carefully avoiding any indorsement of anything that anybody else has said. The committee have first set out the treaty to which we are not a party, and then have said:

Whereas the extent and object of the above-cited provisions of said treaty are to place the Christian subjects of the Porte under the protection of the other signatories thereto, and to secure to such Christian subjects full liberty of religious worship and belief, the equal benefit of the laws, and all the privileges and immunities belonging to any subjects of the Turkish Empire; and

Whereas by said treaty the Christian powers parties thereto having established, under the consent of Turkey, their right to accomplish and secure the above-recited objects; and

Whereas the American people, in common with all Christian people everywhere, have beheld with horror the recent appalling outrages and massacres, of which the Christian population of Turkey have been made the victims: Therefore—

Is not that put upon the ground that it is none of our business whatever; that it is the business of some other people, and we are calling on them to attend to their business—not our business? Now, is not that about as contemptible a position as any great nation on God's earth ever put itself in? We are not ready to say to the people of the world that we have a voice in this matter; we are not willing to say that as a great nation of 70,000,000 people we protest in our name to the criminals. We do not say that; but we say: "Inasmuch as you have undertaken to guarantee the protection of your citizens and inasmuch as your citizens have been interfered with, therefore we call upon you to attend to your business in behalf of protecting the Christian subjects of the Sublime Porte."

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will, and in doing so, I treat the gentleman more respectfully than he has treated me under like circumstances.

Mr. QUIGG. I accept the gentleman's rebuke and thank him for his kindness. The gentleman misstates, I think, just what this resolution proposes to do. The Christian sovereigns of Europe have engaged not simply to protect their own citizens, which each nation is understood to be able to do for itself, and which we have succeeded in doing for ourselves pretty well, but the question presented by the present situation is as to what is going on in other people's households. Certain nations have undertaken to protect the subjects of the Ottoman Government from the Ottoman Government and from other subjects of the Ottoman Government; and that Government has agreed that this right of supervision shall be exercised. The resolution which we present simply inquires why those nations and the Ottoman Government do not do as they have agreed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the remark of my friend has rendered necessary any change in my line of argument, or that he has met any of the objections I have made. My point is this: Why does not this committee embody in the preamble of this resolution a charge, definitely stating that somebody has been robbed or killed or maltreated in some way? Why attempt now to shield ourselves behind the duty of certain European powers?

My point on this proposition is this: If the outrages committed in Turkey are so great as to call upon us to demand the execution of the provisions of that treaty by the other powers of Europe, why may we not, in a proper manner, protest to Turkey herself, directly, against the outrages she has committed? Why may we not say to Turkey in some sort of diplomatic language, that will mean a little something, "You have murdered 30,000 people for no other reason than that they were Christians and did not belong to the religion of your nationality. We in America protest to you against it as an outrage and protest in the name of Christian civilization." Why should we call upon other nations of Europe to do that which we have a perfect right to do for ourselves?

Mr. MORSE. Give us an amendment like that and we will vote for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not all. Why may we not say to a nation that murders 30,000 people in a very few months' time, by a line of atrocities that has stirred the blood of the American people as nothing has ever done heretofore, except it be the recitation of the murders committed in the Wyoming Valley and other scenes in our own country by the Indians under the stimulus of the same nation that stands across the pathway of the protection of Christians in Turkey—why may we not protest, in thunder tones, against such treatment as that, by saying to that sort of a nation, "We do not want anything to do with you." [Applause.]

You will not allow a Chinaman to come to this country; we legislate against it; but, Mr. Speaker, for my own part I would rather have 10,000 Chinamen to come every month than that for one moment my country should stand abashed and cowardly in the presence of the outrages committed by the Turkish Empire. [Applause.]

But the answer to that comes from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], who made this report. It would not do to protest against an outrage direct to the Turkish Government, because it would insult and offend the Turk. It will not do to withdraw diplomatic relations with that country, because it would offend and insult Turkey; and thereupon comes this most singular argument, and I ask your attention to it: If you assert the manhood of the American people there is danger that Turkey will murder somebody in retaliation. We are told that that is an argument against the course I have suggested.

But, Mr. Speaker, what an argument is that! We are holding diplomatic relations with a country of whom a Representative on this floor says there is imminent danger—and, knowing the character of the animal well, he can estimate it—that if we withdraw all such relationship and show that we do not want anything to do with them—telling them, "you are murderers," "you do not respect your treaties," "you are nothing but a set of bandits and criminals"—then if we do that they tell us that the Turk is such a character that he will at once proceed to murder American citizens, now in Turkey, by way of retaliation. Now, let us apply that argument. Let us examine it for a moment. The ad absurdum of the argument is apparent to every intelligent man who considers it even for a moment. If that be the rule of diplomatic action on the part of a great Government like ours, when will the time come when the American people may assert their rights and dignity? The American citizen is all over the world; he is in all European countries, he is in Asia, in Africa, in Oceanica, in all of the islands of the sea. We are estopped to protest, in our own way, in our own manner, against the character of Turkey's treatment of other people, her outrages against civilization, her murder of 30,000 Christians in a few months' time under circumstances of the utmost atrocity and cruelty, and done apparently by the acquiescence, even the direction, of the Turkish Government itself, and we dare not protest lest our own citizens be murdered in retaliation!

Well, Mr. Speaker, that has not been the course of the United States as she has pursued it hitherto. When Chile insulted our flag and shot some of our sailors we did not wait to see what the effect of a demand for redress would be upon the American residents there. We did not take time to speculate on that problem. We did not ask, will Chile arrest some of our people and punish them? We sent a war ship, two or three of them, down there, and an Administration of this country that respected the flag and understood something of the diplomatic proprieties gave immediate notice that matters should be set right instanter, and if not that he would bombard their principal town. He did not stop and wait and inquire what were the possibilities of injury to American citizens there. He did not stop to inquire whether Americans were to be held as hostages or not.

The argument is now that Turkey has hostages in the person of our representatives abroad. Turkey, we are told, has in her camp some of our prisoners and they will be scalped and burned at the stake. You must not disturb the peace and harmony of the Emperor of Turkey, because they are such a peculiar people, they are such a class of men, they belong to such a peculiar race of people, that if the United States should protest against the outrages already committed they might work destruction, and kill some of our American citizens and burn American property. And so, in the face of this dire threat, the protest comes that we must waive our manhood, we must sink our national independence and make our protest through somebody else who will transmit our language lest the deadly Turk should drive his scimiter, already gory with the blood of 30,000 Christians, into the bodies of some of our own people.

We have in that way on this floor to-day given notice to Turkey how she can protect herself. She needs no ships, she needs no army, she needs nothing but her murderous purpose. She has been informed by distinguished gentlemen, representatives of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that she has a means of redress in her own hands. They have said, "Go on, Mr. Turk, with your outrages, murder as much as you please, disgrace civilization, kill and burn, and we dare not do anything, for you have hostages in your camp, and we fear you will kill our people; and therefore, in the interest of saving the lives of American people who are to-day in the Ottoman Empire, we will make ourselves contemptible in the sight of the world." That is this whole case in a nutshell, as put by the gentlemen who are advocating the adoption of these resolutions.

So, Mr. Speaker, I adopt the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] who made this report. There is nothing in these resolutions; and when a great nation, when a great power like the United States opens its mouth to say something and says nothing, she has lowered herself in the estimation of all the nations of the world. Let foreign diplomacy take hold of this insignificant paper. Let foreign diplomats analyze the meaning of all this, and what have you got? You have an enunciation, coming from the champion of this resolution, speaking, I take it, by authority of the committee, that they dare not attack Turkey lest Turkey shall retaliate against the United States. I should like to have the gentleman tell me when the time will come that that argument will not be an absolute barrier to an expression of the manly independence of this Government against any nation on the face of the earth?

It is said that Turkey has responded to some of our demands, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] asks me specifically to state some place and time where an American has been murdered. Why, my understanding is that the situation is about this: Numbers of our missionaries have been murdered, their property has been destroyed, the American college in one of the towns, says the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], was burned up. The burden of proof, the onus probandi, is upon the gentlemen who are defending Turkey upon this floor. It is upon the attorneys for Turkey, who are trying to palliate the crime of Turkey, to tell us who it was they paid for. Give us the language of their apology. Tell us when it was that they paid for an American college destroyed. Tell us when it was that these missionaries were protected. Some of them were from my own State, and they were driven out, fleeing at the point of the bayonet or of the saber. Let these gentlemen tell me when the Turks restored one dollar of that property or made a demand for the protection of one of these people.

Mr. COX. Will my friend yield to me for one moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. COX. If anything of that kind has occurred to an American citizen, in his person or his property, you can not make your resolution so strong that I will not vote for it——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. COX. Wait a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will wait five.

Mr. COX. But has it not been conceded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG]—I hope I will have the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, the gentleman has my close attention.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether I will entertain the gentleman or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You always entertain me.

Mr. COX. Has it not been conceded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] that not an American citizen or his property has been disturbed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not responsible for what the gentleman from New York has said.

Mr. QUIGG. No such thing has been said by me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not heard any such concession.

Mr. COX. Wait a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The strongest statement was made——

Mr. COX. We will take care of ourselves when we come to the point. You will not go further than I in the protection of American citizens. Now, who has been despoiled of his property or his rights?

Mr. QUIGG. I stated to the House the official information conveyed by the Secretary of State, in answer to a Senate resolution, which, of course, is as open to the gentleman from Tennessee as to me——

Mr. COX. Of course.

Mr. QUIGG. And if the gentleman from Tennessee will take the trouble to read that, he will discover that the Secretary of State says that in several instances the property of American citizens has been destroyed.

Mr. COX. Let me ask you one question. Has not that Government offered to repay—to compensate for everything of that kind?

Mr. QUIGG. So the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has said.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, I ask you.

Mr. QUIGG. I have not heard of any such offer. What I said was that the Turkish Government did not deny the responsibility for losses of property on account of these riots. We have presented our claim in one case and have our claims still to present in other cases, and these claims——

Mr. COX. I am with you in feeling, but——

Mr. SAYERS. Let the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] finish his answer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to have the gentleman finish his statement, of course, but I do not desire to yield possession of the floor.

Mr. HITT. May I answer that question?

Mr. QUIGG. I had nearly finished. The closing sentence which I wished to say was this: We have presented one claim for damages, as I understand the fact to be. We are presenting other claims for damages, and the Government of Turkey has not denied its responsibility.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Nor admitted it.

Mr. COX. I want to know whether that goes in or not.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. The reporter has it.

Mr. COX. Now, hold a minute there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me while I get the point developed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to be perfectly courteous to the gentleman, but he is making a speech.

Mr. COX. No, I am not. I am trying to get you to the point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I decline the assistance of the gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I want to emphasize this point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I can not locate the point, I can not be helped by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. COX. You will not do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What do you want to ask me?

Mr. COX. I want to get at this point: Is there an American citizen that has had any claim against the Government over there that has not been compensated or assured that he would be?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already said, if the gentleman has not misunderstood me, that it is a matter of public knowledge that American citizens have been despoiled in property, that missionaries from my own State have been murdered, and that the burden of proof is upon the other side to show that Turkey has done anything about it. [Applause.] That is the point I make. Colleges have been burned. I do not care to go into details. But if a single American citizen has been wronged, that is enough to allow this country to demand reparation, and to demand it very quick; to demand it as promptly as we demanded it of Chile; to demand it from a big nation or a small nation, hovered over by the greatest nation on earth, if you please, and send our ships and our demand and come to an issue upon the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. That is all right. I agree with you on that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not believe in apologies to the Turkish Government by this House.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I understand the facts to be as I have alleged them. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, stated to-day, as I understand, the general concession that would be made. He did not refer to the murders that had been made public. He did speak of the despoiling of property, and that the demands were made; and all that the gentlemen who are more fully advised of it than we are able to say is that Turkey has not denied its obligations. That is all. Is not that a beautiful position to put ourselves into? Is that the protection to the American citizen that we are talking about? As a distinguished Senator said the other day with wonderful force, which thrilled the whole United States, "There is but one redeeming feature of the national character of the British Government, and what seems to be more striking about that characteristic is that it has absorbed all that characteristic from the English-speaking people—that is, the characteristic that follows with guns and ships and declarations of war every British subject, in every corner of the earth, and protects him and vindicates him from outrage, oppression, murder, and violation of property."

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to say "amen"?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; the gentleman says "amen." There is no "amen" in this thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. All right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not a word of "amen" there; there is not so much as "Lord be merciful to us sinners."

Mr. COX. You are right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I denounce it as a most inefficient, incomplete, and unworthy utterance of the American people. They have asked us for bread, and we are giving them a stone. They have asked us for the fish of a Christian nation's powerful protest, and we have given them the serpent of an abject falling down and apology at the feet of the Turkish Government. I protest that these resolutions are inadequate; and, while I will not put myself in the attitude of saying that we have no right to make a protest, while I do not stand upon the same ground as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], I hope that, in the interest of American manhood, the committee will withdraw this report and give us something that will impress upon the American people the idea that we are not apologists for crime, but are defenders of civilization the world over. [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania later.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 4690) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OUTRAGES IN ARMENIA.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, either American citizens have suffered from the outrages in Turkey in common with citizens of other countries as well as of Turkey itself, or they have not. If they have, and the Committee on Foreign Relations has had before it for such a length of time various resolutions upon this subject and has failed to ascertain the true facts, then that committee, and that committee alone, will be responsible for anything that we do upon the subject in this House. The main question presents several delicate considerations. In the first place, it involves the right of this nation, which has always been maintained and I trust always will be maintained, to protect its own citizens in any corner of the globe. It involves, further, the right of this nation to go beyond that—and this is the real question in the case—our right to go beyond that and listen to the complaints of those who are subjects of the Sultan himself, and who allege that their rights, which are guaranteed by treaties with the great European powers, as well as their natural rights, which all men must recognize, have been and are being constantly violated by the outrages perpetrated on the men and the women of that nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that when a natural right is violated—and when I say a natural right I mean a right that no State can give and no State can take away—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness which our own Declaration says is inalienable and which no State has ever given and no State can take away—when these natural rights have been violated and when the invasions of them are continual and habitual, I contend that we, as a civilized nation, have a right to enter such a protest as we see fit, going even to the verge of a declaration of war. I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that I for one believe that these resolutions are inadequate; inadequate to protect our own citizens when they have suffered from these outrages, inadequate to protect the citizens of any other country too cowardly to protect its own people, inadequate to protect those who are being murdered by the thousands, who are not citizens of any civilized European power, but subjects of Turkey itself, and in whose behalf most of the sympathy has been aroused in this country.

I remember reading in the speeches of Daniel Webster how in times gone by, during the Greek revolution, when we had no representatives in that part of the world, it was proposed to send a special commissioner for the purpose of protecting the people from massacres such as those which have been perpetrated recently upon the Armenians. I did not intend to speak at all upon this question, but I feel impelled to say that in my opinion the resolutions before the House are too tame. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that we should go further. I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs should ascertain and determine what power this country can exercise in the matter, and if we can use any power, either by persuasion or force. I believe that we ought to go to the very limit of its exercise in behalf of the people who are now suffering these terrible persecutions.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Would the gentleman substitute for these resolutions a declaration of war?

Mr. WALSH. I would not substitute a declaration of war unless the proper authorities decided that we could declare war on this account, and unless it appeared that that was the only thing that would stop these outrages. In that case I would. That I regard, however, at present as extreme and unnecessary, but I can imagine circumstances that would justify it.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Who are "the proper authorities"?

Mr. WALSH. I should suppose they were the State Department and the committees of the two Houses of Congress on our foreign relations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this whole question should be considered with this object in view: This being a joint resolution it will require the approval of the Executive, and it should be so framed as to receive it.

Mr. DINGLEY. These are concurrent resolutions, and under the practice they need not be signed by the Executive. They are a mere expression of opinion by the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is some dispute about that. I have made inquiry on the subject, and I am going now upon the theory that such resolutions as these do require the approbation of the Executive. At all events, it is plain that without the cooperation of the executive department of the Government a resolution of this kind, if adopted by Congress, would be entirely nugatory—would amount to nothing. The question for us to consider, therefore, in framing the resolutions which we are to adopt is not merely what opinions we desire to express on behalf of the Senate and the House, but what opinions will be approved by the executive arm of the Government with reference to this subject. And here let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe that if we had had a James G. Blaine in the State Department no resolutions of this kind would have been brought to either House; nor would they have been necessary. The fault lies in that direction. If these resolutions, or the amendment presented by the gentleman from Iowa, so drastic in its nature, should pass, they would be an absolute nullity, except so far as regards the expression of the sentiment embodied in them.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. The third clause of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution reads:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Mr. BRUMM. So, Mr. Speaker, it would appear that my position is correct as to these resolutions requiring the approval of the Executive. Now, that being the case, ought we not to consider how far we can get the present Executive to go with us in this matter? What is the use of discussing this question here and passing resolutions which we know will not meet the approval of the Executive? It seems to me that we ought to stop all discussion of this character and adopt the resolutions of the Senate as reported to the House by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That, I think, is the only practical solution of the question, and whatever good it may do, let it operate to that extent. Anything beyond that is, under the circumstances, mere buncombe and nonsense, because it can not receive the approval of the Executive.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in the treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, we find that the parties were the Ottoman Empire, Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Prussia. I am unable to understand how a treaty by those powers can bind the United States. We should at that time, in the interest of humanity and civilization, have demanded, not only as one of the great powers, but as the great power of the world, to be a party to that treaty. England and Russia stand to-day with their eyes upon Armenia. Thirty thousand people have been murdered. Living babes have been torn from the wombs of dead mothers and impaled upon the picks of the Kurds. Thirty thousand more are to be murdered, and then thrice 30,000, and England and Russia will then step in to divide the land. The Christian people on this side of the Atlantic stand appalled when they read of these crimes against the Armenians. England, Russia, and the other nations of the Old World, who are parties to the treaty of 1878, will do nothing until the time shall come when these cruelties have gone so far that the dismemberment of European Turkey shall be demanded by all Christendom, and then England and Russia will occupy and parcel out between each other the land of the once proud but now "Unspeakable Turk."

Mr. Speaker, I will vote for this resolution as it comes from the Senate, but will do so under protest. These Armenians are among the oldest Christian people of the earth, and as when a boy at Sunday school I learned with horror of the edict of Herod when the babes of Bethlehem were murdered, so I look with horror to-day upon the murders committed in Armenia, and I believe this great Christian Republic, where the broadest religious liberty is tolerated should protest, not only by words, but by deeds, against the most gigantic and horrible persecutions and murder of these inoffensive Christians, and though the United States was not a party to the treaty, it would be a wise, Christian, humanitarian policy for the great squadron that lazily rides at anchor in Hampton Roads to-day to pass the Dardanelles and make a demonstration upon Constantinople. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe, with Lowell, that—

> Mankind are one in spirit, and an instinct bears along,
> Round the earth's electric circle, the swift flash of right or wrong;
> Whether conscious or unconscious, yet humanity's vast frame
> Through its ocean-sundered fibers feels the gush of joy or shame;
> In the gain or loss of one race, all the rest have equal claim.

[Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY].

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I should be untrue to my convictions and those of my people if I did not avail myself of this debate to say a single word by way of expressing the sentiments of the people of my district in Connecticut upon this question. During the last four or five weeks—yes, for a longer time—the people of my district and of the city of New Haven have been holding mass meetings upon this question of Armenian outrages. They are fully aroused. Not only have they held meetings, but they have memorialized Congress; they have sent here letters and resolutions asking that we take some steps toward the amelioration of the condition of the Armenians. Not only are my constituents adopting resolutions, not only are they sending petitions to this body, but during the last few weeks they have been passing subscription papers from house to house for the purpose of raising money to send it to these suffering Christians. The people of my district, so far as I understand, are ready to take any step that they can legally, properly, and morally take, which will suppress, or assist in suppressing, the Armenian outrages now practiced by the Turks and Kurds.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOWE].

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Speaker, I would be recreant to the voice of my constituents and recreant to the voice of humanity if I failed to join in expressing my emphatic condemnation of the indignities and outrages which have been inflicted upon innocent people in Armenia. The Armenians in their sufferings and in their heroism are but typical of the men who have stood in all ages for liberty, for the right to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences. We have the evidence here that thousands of men, women, and children have been slaughtered without mercy; and a demand comes across the sea bidding us in the name of God to heed the cry of those suffering people and succor them. It is our duty as the representatives of the people to heed that cry and to pass this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this Government has no grievance. Sir, the civilization of the nineteenth century has a grievance; and its voice should go out with emphasis from this body, speaking not only to the Turks, but to Englishmen and Frenchmen: "Get thee behind; and if necessary let Russia take full possession and divide up this foul spot of iniquity and efface it from the map of the world." [Applause.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TAFT, it was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the Senate resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to refer this Senate resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 55, noes 103.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to commit the Senate concurrent resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to strike out all after the words "concurrent resolution," and report back the matter which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of instructions will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Government of the United States that the Government of Turkey take such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Government of Turkey.

Resolved further, That the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. On that resolution, Mr. Speaker, I ask a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is that proposition debatable?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, are the instructions amendable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I move, then, to strike out the last resolution proposed.

Mr. BAILEY. I am content with that modification, and will withdraw the concluding part of the resolution.

Mr. MILES. Let it be read as modified.

The SPEAKER. It will be read as now modified by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Government of the United States that the Government of Turkey take such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them as men and Christians.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Government of Turkey.

Mr. BAILEY. I will detain the House only long enough to say that in my view of the question a treaty stipulation entered into between the Government of Turkey and the other contracting parties is a matter with which the United States has no concern. The Government of the United States could have been a party to that treaty, but in obedience to our traditional policy it declined to do so; and I do not think it now proper to insist upon the enforcement of treaty obligations to which this Government is not a party and in which it declined to take a part.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to a question for information?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to ask if the Government of the United States was invited to become a party to that treaty?

Mr. BAILEY. All powers were.

Mr. HITT. Is the gentleman quite sure of that fact?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution and the motion to commit, as proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I make the point of order that the motion would not be in order, as the gentleman from Texas has the floor.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas, as the Chair understood, had yielded the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I did, and only resumed it to answer an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understood; and it was after the gentleman had yielded the floor that the Chair recognized the gentleman from New York for his motion.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to commit this matter to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the instructions which have been read.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to offer a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. It would not, as the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. OWENS. My motion would be to refer it, the idea being not to take it from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but to refer it back to that committee with instructions to embrace the protest directed to the Turkish Government.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. OWENS. I know; but whatever the House now proposes the committee must report back. My intention was to leave it all to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, the gentleman's proposition is not now admissible.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me, the House had already voted down the general motion to recommit, anyway.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the instructions already reported to the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 41, noes 119.

So the motion of Mr. BAILEY was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. QUIGG. That has already been voted on. The question is on the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair was absent for a moment, and supposed that was still pending. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. TURNER of Georgia,) there were—ayes 143, noes 26.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. QUIGG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST GRADUATE COLLEGE OF MEDICINE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 650.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, desires to call up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 650) to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That Henry L. E. Johnson, Edmund L. Tompkins, J. Foster Scott, William W. Johnston, Samuel C. Busey, Charles W. Richardson, James Kerr, Middleton F. Cuthbert, Edward M. Parker, G. Wythe Cook, G. Byrd Harrison, Samuel S. Adams, George N. Acker, W. Holland Wilmer, Henry D. Fry, J. Ford Thompson, and Thomas E. McArdle, their associates and successors, physicians, be, and they are hereby, made a corporation by the name of Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia, with all the powers and privileges, and subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions set forth in this act.

SEC. 2. That the said corporation may hold real and personal estate to the amount of $200,000.

SEC. 3. That the said Post Graduate School of Medicine is hereby empowered, from time to time, to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they may find necessary, and do and perform such other things as may be requisite for carrying this act into effect, and which may not be repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the said Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia is hereby endowed with all the rights, privileges, and immunities that appertain to other medical schools of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] who reported the bill.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill has for its object the incorporation of the Post Graduate School of Medicine, to enable graduates of medical colleges and those studying medicine to attain a higher degree of proficiency. It has the approval of the District Commissioners, and is in line with the more advanced ideas prevailing in larger cities. It has no power to grant diplomas. The bill has been considered by the District Committee and meets with their unanimous approval.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand, this bill simply proposes to incorporate this institution. It does not vote any money out of the Treasury?

Mr. ODELL. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not see any objection to the bill. Is the institution authorized to confer medical degrees?

Mr. ODELL. No; it does not issue any diplomas at all.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It is a post graduate school of medicine?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. For those who have graduated in other colleges?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. If this school can grant no diplomas or degrees, what does the last section mean, which confers all the rights, powers, and immunities of other medical schools in the District of Columbia? They all confer degrees.

Mr. ODELL. The institution has the power to grant a certain certificate of attendance.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is a post-graduate course, and has the same authority to confer degrees or diplomas as any medical school would have.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know that that may be an objection to the bill, but certainly the bill does grant to this school of medicine the right to issue diplomas and to confer degrees. Section 4 authorizes it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What objection is there to that?

Mr. MAHON. A post-graduate school ought to confer them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The students at that school are those who have graduated at other colleges?

Mr. ODELL. They are the only ones who are admitted.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If they want two diplomas why should they not have them?

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to say in reference to this measure that it simply provides for a post-graduate medical course. In nearly every city in the United States where there are medical schools this course is provided, but there is no such school in the city of Washington. It proposes a course of bedside training, to fit medical graduates for practice, and it would naturally confer diplomas showing the course that had been taken. This bill passed the Senate on the 10th day of January, and has been fully considered by the committee. The incorporators are representative citizens of the District, and there is no opposition of any kind to the measure; at least none has been developed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Can this college grant diplomas to any persons except students who take that course?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; nobody except their own graduates.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. One further question, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I observe that this is to be limited to those who have already received a degree of M. D. Will the gentleman point to a provision in this bill where there is any such limitation? It bears the name "post graduate," but there is nothing else in it.

Mr. HENDERSON. They have to be graduates in order to take a post-graduate course.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But this does not say so.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is covered by it. They have already graduated.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It does not make any difference.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let them have their other degree.

Mr. HULICK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, and that is whether all the different schools of medicine in the District of Columbia are represented here, and can they have their graduates come into this post-graduate institution, and each of them be respected and have their graduation recognized?

Mr. BABCOCK. The committee understood that this bill received the approval of the entire profession in the city of Washington.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There can not be any danger about having too many colleges, especially where it does not cost anything.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene;

A bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood;

A bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill.

FAILURE OF COLONIZATION OF NEGROES IN MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of all correspondence of record, relating to the failure of the scheme for the colonization of negroes in Mexico, necessitating their return to their home in Alabama.

I referred to this matter in my message to Congress at the beginning of the present session, and for the reasons then given I again urge the propriety of making an appropriation to cover the cost of transportation furnished by the railroad companies.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 27, 1896.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. The message, I suppose, will be ordered printed, and it will be printed in the RECORD. Whether that will include all the correspondence and accompanying papers, or simply the message of the President, ought to be determined now, in order that there may be no such mistake as occurred before, when the message and the accompanying papers were printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The correspondence will not be printed in the RECORD. The message will be printed in the RECORD, and the message and accompanying papers will be printed as an executive document.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HULL. Pending that, I would like to get a change of reference of a bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if the gentleman will permit me to secure the reference of a special report as to Allegheny River, to have it referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Can not that be done before we adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It can not be made as a matter of right.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will withdraw the motion for one moment, simply for these two purposes.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws the motion he must withdraw it entirely.

Mr. DINGLEY. I withdraw the motion.

BOARD OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that part of the report of the Board of Managers referring to the appropriation, or calling for an appropriation, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the administrative portion of the report be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the administrative part of the report of the governors of the Soldiers' Homes be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that that part relating to the appropriations be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEELE. And the same order with reference to the report for the State homes.

The SPEAKER. And that the same order be made with reference to State homes. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I simply ask that the Speaker refer to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a communication of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. It has already been referred.

NATIONAL GUARDS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 4250) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to exchange with the National Guards of the respective States Springfield rifles of the pattern of the year 1884 for Springfield rifles of the pattern of the year 1873, with instructions that it be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LACEY. I have just filed the report accompanying the bill (H. R. 3948) to provide for free homes on lands purchased from the Indian tribes. The minority would like to have four or five days in which to file their views.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEE IN DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire immediate consideration?

Mr. ODELL. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution of January 14, directing the Doorkeeper of the House to employ Willis Bolls as an additional employee in the document room during the Fifty-fourth Congress, to be paid at the rate of $100 per month out of the contingent fund of the House, to prepare the bills of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses for binding, as provided for in the act of January 12, 1895, beg to report that they have made investigation of the subject, and respectfully submit and recommend the adoption of the following as a substitute for the same:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ some suitable person as an additional employee in the document room to prepare for binding the bills of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses, as provided for in the act of January 12, 1895, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,000 per annum during the Fifty-fourth Congress, or that portion thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of said act, out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If this motion is voted down, this matter then comes up for consideration, does it not?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I hope we will vote the motion down.

Mr. CANNON. That is a speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. We want to know the facts.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You can get the facts in about three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Division.

The House divided. Pending the count,

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE said: I desire to make another parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This matter, as I understand it, will come up in the morning if not acted upon to-night.

The SPEAKER. It is unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the House adjourning.

The SPEAKER. The demand for a division is withdrawn; the ayes have it. Pending the announcement, the Chair desires to present the following requests of members:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DRAPER, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOVENER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUFF, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PENDLETON, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SORG, for one week, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON presented sundry petitions of citizens of Harrisburg and Steelton, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. QUAY. I present a memorial of the Pennsylvania State board of agriculture, remonstrating against the free distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture. I should be glad, if there is no objection, to have the memorial read, as the question is now pending.

There being no objection, the memorial was read, as follows:

Whereas a resolution is now pending in the Senate of the United States designed to reestablish in the Department of Agriculture the free-seed distribution discontinued by the Secretary of Agriculture on the ground of his inability to find such seeds "as are rare and uncommon in the country," as defined by the law; and

Whereas Secretary Morton arrived at such a conclusion after an experience of three years, during which he has distributed over 27,000,000 packages of seeds free, 21,809,004 packages having been distributed during that time through Congressmen, in spite of which he reports to the Senate committee that the seed distribution has been unsatisfactory and not calculated to promote the general interest of agriculture and horticulture; and

Whereas the said Secretary failed to receive any satisfactory bids in reply to his advertisement for seeds as defined in the law; and

Whereas he further stated to the aforesaid committee of the Senate that over two and a half million dollars had been expended for the distribution of free seed by the Department during the past thirty years, and that he was unable to find evidence in any of the records or reports of the Department citing a single instance in recent years whereby agriculture or horticulture had received any special benefit from this free-seed distribution; and

Whereas in the opinion of this body the desirability of the National Government engaging in this free-seed distribution while apparently and no doubt serving a useful purpose in early days, when the difficulty of securing improved varieties was great and ignorance as to the agricultural capabilities of the country were rife, owing to the rapid opening up of new sections, with new conditions of climate and soil, has, owing to the changed conditions of the present, and the facility with which all the best varieties of different kinds of seed adapted to the wants of the country may be procured through the large and commercial enterprises established throughout the country, ceased to exist: Therefore,

Resolved, That the free distribution of seed by the national Department of Agriculture has heretofore conducted is unnecessary, inexpedient, and expensive, and can not under existing conditions be carried on in strict conformity with the law under which such appropriations are authorized, and that the same is not calculated to promote the interests of agriculture and horticulture; and this body sincerely deprecates any effort or legislative enactment calculated to revive this wasteful and absurd practice.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of Agriculture deserves the thanks and commendation of the agriculturists of the country for his strict construction of this law and his candid and forcible recommendations on the subject.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to inquire who sends the memorial which has just been read? What is the source?

Mr. QUAY. It is a memorial comprising a preamble and resolutions adopted by the State board of agriculture of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I thought perhaps it had come from some seed dealer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As the joint resolution is pending, the memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY presented the petition of H. Hunter, jr., and 24 other citizens of Allegheny County, Pa., and the petition of A. W. Carpenter and 64 other citizens of Susquehanna County, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of the legislature of the State of Washington, praying for a Federal survey of the oyster beds of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Washington:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, J. H. Price, secretary of state of the State of Washington, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of the house memorial No. 18 with the original now on file in this office and find the same to be a true and perfect copy thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Washington.

Done at Olympia, this 21st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1896.

J. H. PRICE, Secretary of State.

House memorial No. 18.

Whereas an accurate survey of the sounds and estuaries of the State of Washington will greatly promote the interests of this State and encourage the oyster industry; and

Whereas a knowledge of the various bodies of water, their temperature and specific gravities, the strength and velocity of the currents, the nature of the bottom, and other physical characteristics are necessary to show the areas fit and unfit for the culture of oysters: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the governor is hereby requested to ask the Federal Government to assist the State by making the proposed survey, as was done by the Federal Government for Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and other States, and to detail one or more officers of the United States Navy to make a physical examination of the waters of the State of Washington and prepare a chart, showing in detail the areas suitable and unsuitable for the cultivation of oysters, as well as the natural oyster beds.

Whereas it is conceded in the treaty between the United States and Russia under which the Territory of Alaska (formerly Russian America) was purchased by the former from the latter which said treaty was ratified by the United States Senate and proclaimed by President Johnson in the year 1867, that the United States Government is entitled to a strip of territory 10 marine leagues in width parallel with the coast from the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude, thereby including within the limits and possession of the United States in said territory, all the harbors, bays, and inlets between the said fifty-sixth degree of north latitude and the said one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude; and

Whereas within the said Territory of Alaska are extensive gold mines and placer gold fields which are attracting thousands of American laborers; also mountains of marble, lime, and iron; extensive coal fields, together with valuable deposits of copper, nickel, and platinum; and

Whereas England, with her usual cupidity and avarice, and pursuant to her time-honored custom of attempting at all hazards to gain control of all new developing sources of wealth in whatsoever country situated and to appropriate to her own benefit present and prospective commerce of the seas, whether rightfully or otherwise, has asserted claim to the harbors, bays, and inlets through which the greater portion of the commerce and trade of and with the said Territory of Alaska must be carried on, and which of right as aforesaid belong to the United States; and

Whereas the United States will be robbed and despoiled of the trade and commerce of a veritable empire and suffer an appreciable diminution of the wealth which nature has endowed said territory if the policy and claims of Great Britain as aforesaid shall prevail: Therefore,

House memorial No. 21.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the house of representatives and senate of the State of Washington, in legislature assembled, most respectfully represent:

Whereas it has been ascertained by careful inspection that the Okanogan River from its confluence with the Columbia River, near Bridgeport, in Douglas County, State of Washington, to the State line, a distance of about 75 miles, can, with moderate expense, be rendered navigable for boats of about 3-feet draft; and

Whereas the country tributary to the said river is one of vast mineral and agricultural resources, and is now without steam transportation facilities; and

Whereas the cost of freighting by wagon renders all traffic and trade expensive; and

Whereas by rendering the Okanogan River navigable a continuous waterway will be made over the Columbia and Okanogan rivers from Wenatchee, on the Great Northern Railway, to the northern boundary of the State of Washington, a distance of about 160 miles, thereby making possible a much cheaper mode of transporting the machinery, tools, and supplies necessary for the development of the said mineral and agricultural resources into and the product of the mines, farms, and orchards out of the country tributary to the said Okanogan River than is now had: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, your memorialists, would respectfully urge that immediate action be taken, and that a sufficient amount be included in the next river and harbor appropriation bill for the purpose of making the improvements necessary to open the said river, and that a copy of this memorial be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House; and thus will your memorialists ever pray.

House memorial No. 23.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Washington, respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas the city of Olympia, the capital of the State of Washington, is a growing maritime port, advantageously situated on the waters of Puget Sound; and

Whereas the General Government has recognized the advantages of the harbor of said city to trade and commerce on the Pacific coast, and has heretofore appropriated the sum of $75,000 for deepening and widening the channel of said harbor, with the result that to-day it is one of the safest, most accessible land locked harbors in the United States; and

Whereas the said city of Olympia, at its own expense, has thrown a bulkhead across said harbor from shore to shore for the purpose, eventually, of forming a fresh-water harbor of about 3½ miles frontage to the south of said bulkhead; and

Whereas by the expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money locks can be constructed, thereby excluding salt water from the area south of said bulkhead and securing an entirely fresh-water supply from the Deschutes River: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Washington, That the State of Washington respectfully asks the Congress of the United States to appropriate the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of constructing locks in the harbor of said city of Olympia; and

Be it further resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to furnish a certified copy of this memorial to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, the Secretary of War, and the United States engineer officer to this department, and that our delegation in Congress be especially requested to exert their influence to obtain the said appropriation. And your memorialists will, in duty bound, ever pray.

House concurrent resolution No. 24.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Washington, most respectfully represent that

Whereas the constantly increasing interests and commerce of the United States in the Pacific Ocean, in which commerce the State of Washington is directly and very largely interested, demand the maintaining of an efficient navy by the United States; and

Whereas the building of the Nicaragua Canal in the near future will further augment the necessity for such efficient navy; and

Whereas the efficiency of a navy depends even more upon the ability and experience of its officers than on the perfection of its material: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Washington, That we indorse House bill No. 8476, Fifty-third Congress, third session, being a bill to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, it being the result of mature consideration of the matter by a joint commission appointed from the Naval Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, and as being a practicable way of accomplishing the result sought for, viz, promoting the efficiency of the Navy; and

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to furnish certified copies of this memorial to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Washington, and also to the chairman of the Naval Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress.

OUTRAGES IN ARMENIA.

Mr. TURPIE. I present a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a meeting of local churches of Rensselaer, Ind., held in Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church January 19, 1896, expressing sympathy for the suffering people of Armenia and remonstrating against their further oppression. The petitioners respectfully urge our Government to make every possible effort to induce the Governments of Christendom to rouse themselves from their apathy and put an end to this intolerable state of affairs, which threatens with extermination thousands and thousands of our fellow-Christians, and urging also upon our Government to do everything in its power to preserve the fruits of American missionary toil and expressing their ardent sympathy with the unutterable sufferings of this persecuted race; and calling upon all the peoples of Christendom to insist that these unutterable sufferings shall cease.

Mr. President, this petition comes from a very respectable source in Indiana, and I should like to address the Senate very briefly on the subject.

Armenia is an oasis of Christian faith placed in a desert of unbelief. It is the largest body of Christians having any local or racial unity within the limits of the Ottoman Empire. Its inhabitants had been long subject to the Turks before the Sublime Porte was located at Constantinople. They have been faithful subjects of that Empire. They have paid their treasure in its support. They have furnished the blood and life of their sons, their fathers, and their brethren for the defense of the Empire against foreign invasion. They were not charged in the recent calamities which have befallen them with any disloyalty to the Turkish Government. They were charged with no revolt, with no attempt at treason or rebellion. They were charged with no disobedience of any law or ordinance of the Empire. They were charged only with being Christians. They were charged, they were seized, they were condemned, they were executed, under circumstances of indescribable atrocity, as Christians.

Their only crime was that they persisted in exercising that right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, a right, as has been said, guaranteed to them by the treaty of Berlin, but a right given, granted to them and all mankind by a power greater than either of those of the signatories to that instrument—the Divine Creator of the universe.

Sir, I think at this juncture the time approaches when there ought to be express advices, official notifications (if that be the more courtly phrase) given to the Government of Turkey—to the Turkish Government and to the Mohammedan Church—that there has been a great and fatal decadence of that power in the last three centuries. The Turkish Government is recognized and established; but how? By reason of its own strength or merit? Not for a day. It is supported and only maintained by those international jealousies which cluster around the transatlantic segment of the Monroe doctrine, called in all the waters of the Mediterranean the balance of power in Europe, forbidding the acquisition of further territory in Europe by any of the great powers as dangerous to the peace and safety of others. It has long since ceased to be a self-existent and self-supporting monarchy or empire.

The Ottoman Church and the Empire ought both to be notified that they are no longer a power to persecute, that they can no longer proselytize with the sword, that they must erase from the book of discipline and practice of the Mohammedan Church those precepts which make use of arson and murder as means of suppressing the Christian faith.

We have made a notification. I would have with the word already sent the blow to follow it. I would have the message on the wings of lightning sent and the shot to follow it. What a shot that would be crashing into the grand seraglio, traversing the waters of the Golden Horn, to avenge the Christian life and Christian faith of the subjects of that Empire.

I know that this fact of the great decadence of the Ottoman power is as well known to the grand vizier and to the chiefs, the advisers, of the Sublime Porte as it is to any member of this body, but the great bulk of the citizens of that Empire do not know it. The grand vizier is informed of it. I would have the slave of the grand vizier know it and feel it. I would have the teachers in the schools of the Mussulman and in the mosque know it and realize it. I would have the muezzin on the minaret know it and proclaim it to the faithful as they are gathered in the mosques for their devotions.

Six centuries ago the state of the Caliph in Bagdad was very different from that now existing on the Bosphorus. He reigned supreme in all the great countries of southern Asia. His lieutenants ruled with more than regal magnificence Egypt and northern Africa. Spain itself was, as it was said, the second garden of Mohammed, and hundreds of thousands of armed Mussulmans met the united armies of Christian Europe to contend north of the Pyrenees—north of that great mountain range—as to which should have the primacy and supremacy in that quarter of the globe. All this has passed, never to return.

I am not aware, sir, what particular prerogative and privileges are due to national infirmity, to a decaying power, or to a moribund sovereignty, but if there be any such due and owing, and if it be still asked upon our part that we should allow this monstrous, bloody game as the mere play and pastime of the old age and decrepitude of the Ottoman Empire, I for one am in favor of giving the sick man of the Bosphorus a coup de grace and ending his life and existence by dissolution and destruction.

I have read, Mr. President, in some story of these blood-stained relations, of a Kurd or Turk, armed, engaged in the massacre of the Armenian villagers, hearing from the boys and girls who were being slain by his hand, hearing from the wives and mothers who were being hurried to dishonor and death, the same cry, the same supplication, and I have read that this fiend turned to the demons who were his comrades in this work of blood and asked in a tone of derision, "Who is Jesus of Nazareth, that these people pray to Him?"

Sir, it is time that these murderers and assassins should know who He was that was born into the world at Bethlehem and reared at Nazareth; that they and their masters should learn also that when that Divine Ruler returns to vex the reprobateness and wickedness of the world and to punish such wretches as these, He brings with him not peace, but a sword. It may be, sir, that we are destined to reorganize the Crusades of eight and nine centuries ago. It may be that we shall send again around the summons of the fiery cross upon a greatly lengthened circuit. It may be that we shall be called upon to effect the final deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre and of all those who revere its memories in every clime, under every sky. In such a warfare, as in the peace which would follow it, one touch of Christ would make the whole world kin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table, the resolution to which it refers having been passed.

IMPRISONMENT OF EUGENE V. DEBS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Florida, coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. CALL January 23, 1896:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators shall be appointed who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into the imprisonment of Eugene V. Debs for an alleged contempt of court, who shall report to the Senate and recommend such legislation as may be necessary for the just enforcement of the law and the protection of citizens from arbitrary and offensive exercise of judicial power.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have only to say that this resolution was presented to me by persons connected with the labor associations of the United States, with the request that the investigation asked for should be had, and a report made of such measures as may be necessary for the protection of the people against the arbitrary exercise of judicial authority in this respect. I see no kind of objection to conceding this to the wishes of so large a portion of the American people.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, ordinarily I have great respect for the wishes of the laboring people of the United States. I am not aware that in any communication addressed to the Senate the laboring people of the United States have asked for this investigation; I am not aware that even any particular labor organization has asked for it. If there has been any petition presented for it, I do not now recall it. On the other hand, I realize that there have been complaints of the manner in which the power of committal for contempt has been exercised by the Federal courts. There has been much criticism, not only by those directly affected, but by many lawyers. But the Senate should have something before it to act upon before it orders an investigation by a special committee.

I understand, Mr. President, that it is rather against the policy of the Senate to appoint special committees where it can reasonably be avoided. Neither do I think it quite wise to mention particular instances requiring investigation or upon the application of any particular person or persons. That there may be occasion for some investigation I am not now disputing; that there may be occasion for some legislation to the end of regulating to some extent the power of committal for contempt said to have been in some cases arbitrarily exercised I am not now antagonizing. I think if the subject is to be gone into at all, upon which I do not now express any opinion, it would be better that one of the standing committees of this body should have charge of such an investigation in order that such legislation may be proposed as shall be deemed necessary. In that view I do not see any special objection to the proceeding, and for that purpose I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Florida.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute submitted by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee is hereby directed to investigate the whole subject of contempts of court as enforced by the Federal courts, and report to the Senate whether any additional legislation is necessary for the protection of the rights of citizens.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, if it be the sense of the Senate that all investigation into the case of Eugene V. Debs shall be suppressed, and that the opinion of many thousands of American citizens, who are the skilled laborers of this country and the employees of the great corporations, shall not be heard, and if the Senate choose to make this reference and substitute the amendment of the Senator from New York for my resolution, I have nothing to say; but when in a particular case alleged wrong has occurred, why that case should not be made the subject of investigation the Senator from New York has given no reason, and can give none.

If it be true that there has been an arbitrary exercise of judicial power in the form of an injunction against the leader of a great labor organization of the United States for expressing opinions not entertained by the judge, and an imprisonment of six months following it, why should that not be investigated? When, at the request of men prominently connected with that organization, a respectful investigation is asked, and only legislation which will in the future prevent such abuse of power, I can not see why the Senator from New York should invoke a rule or practice of the Senate that special or select committees should not be raised, or that there should be no mention of a particular case.

Why should there be no mention of a particular case if it has been the occasion of wrong in the exercise of power that ought to be carefully limited and carefully exercised? This resolution expresses no opinion as to the propriety of this judicial action; it does not even imply a censure; but, at the request of a great body of the people of this country, it is asked that this investigation shall be had.

Why should the resolution be referred to a standing committee? For myself, I am opposed to the present system of committee organization and the extent to which it has been carried. Those committees are the sepulchers of the movements of the people of the United States for reform; they are the burial places of every effort to obtain an improved and better condition of things and of inquiry into them. Then, again, they are occupied with the ordinary business of the Senate. In the English Parliament great questions can be brought up and every member of Parliament has the opportunity of action, but with us they are referred to a small portion of this body, who possess a veto, according to the course of the Senate, upon the whole remaining power of the body. Therefore I think that in particular cases, where great public opinion exists, and where there is need of careful examination and report and some action to be taken, the better method is that there should be a selection of Senators in order to make it.

Again, a great portion of this body never has any connection with its important business. The committee organization confines it to a few Senators, and the remaining Senators are effectually disfranchised of their rights and their power in this body. So, for one, I should prefer always that important subjects should be referred to select committees, if it were for no other reason than to give all the Senators who are sent here, equal in power and in rights, an opportunity of being connected with the important business of this body.

I am personally indifferent to the course this resolution may take, but it is the expression of the opinion and desire of many thousands and tens of thousands of citizens of the United States who think that the case of this great leader—and he is unquestionably, whether his views are correct or not, a man of power and a representative man in this country—should have its investigation. In my opinion, it is necessary for the preservation of the judicial power of this country and the respect of the people for it that there should be careful limitation of its power, and that it should be exercised in accordance with the principles of American liberty and of our Constitution.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from New York proceeds, will the Chair state what is the precise attitude of the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not think the presentation of this resolution requires any discussion upon the question as to the manner in which the committees of the Senate are organized. I am inclined to think that they are fairly distributed, and represent the different sentiments which prevail in this body. For myself I favor the resolution offered originally by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] so far as it relates to the distribution of the appropriation bills, but beyond that the committees are fairly well organized, and I am inclined to think that each Senator has been reasonably well provided for, including the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. There was not a word or suggestion in what I said which related to the manner of the organization or the personnel of the committees—not the slightest allusion to that whatever.

Mr. HILL. What is the precise point of complaint, then?

Mr. CALL. I said committee organization, whether it include the distinguished Senator from New York or other equally great men who may be assigned to committees, confines the power of the body to them and eliminates and leaves out others who may not be so great, but who are equal in power and in privilege and in duty here with him.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not aware of any legislative body in this country, or scarcely in any other, where there are not committees which have charge of the initiation of legislation. The same is true of every legislature of a State, including, I think, the State of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. HILL. They have committees in which legislation is duly and properly considered. I think committees are incident to the transaction of legislation. But whether that be so or not, it is a question which is entirely foreign to the main point involved in the resolution.

Mr. President, I think I express the sentiment of the Senate when I say that, as a general rule, it is not wise to appoint special committees, and it has not been the custom of the Senate to do it. There may be occasions when, by reason of some matter of most supreme importance, it is wise to have a special committee; but those occasions are very few. Therefore, I think the resolution not wise. I believe it is better in all matters, so far as possible, to confine investigation to standing committees. Then it can not be claimed that any influences are brought to bear in the formation of those committees.

This is a judicial question largely. Why should it not be referred to the Judiciary Committee? Not only that, but the very case to which the Senator refers has been in the courts. It has been before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court has passed upon the rights of Mr. Debs. That court has decided the case. There is no occasion to mention his name in the resolution; there is no occasion to mention the case, because Congress will not assume to pass upon the merits of the controversy. The simple point is, whether legislation is required for the further protection of the citizen. If that be so, then let the Judiciary Committee in a due and orderly way investigate the question and report upon it to the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. While it is true that the Debs case did go before the Supreme Court, it is only true in its nominal sense. It came up on habeas corpus, and the Supreme Court refused to investigate the merits of the case, following the well-established rule that where the court had jurisdiction the writ of habeas corpus would not operate as a writ of error. Therefore, the Supreme Court declined to investigate the merits of the controversy.

Mr. HILL. What does the Senator understand by "the merits of the controversy"? The simple question which the Supreme Court decided was that the imprisonment was legal, was it not?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir. The Supreme Court did not decide anything of the kind. It simply decided that the circuit court had jurisdiction of Mr. Debs on the question of contempt, and that being true, that the writ of habeas corpus could not operate as a writ of error. Therefore, the court declined to investigate the merits. That was a proper decision. But neither the Supreme Court nor any other court, excepting the court of Judge Woods, ever investigated the question of the merits of Mr. Debs's case, or whether he was really guilty of contempt of court or not; and certainly the Senator from New York knows enough about this man Woods, or the circumstances under which he was appointed to the subordinate judiciary, the stain that hung upon him at the time he was appointed as a reward for political trickery, to not give much force to a decision rendered by him.

Mr. HILL. I am not called upon to defend the decision of Judge Woods; neither shall I be led into any criticism of his decision. It is sufficient that in the only way in which Mr. Debs could present his rights, he appealed to the highest court of the United States, and obtained no relief. That is sufficient for my purpose; and it is not contended by anybody but that the Supreme Court made a proper decision upon the questions which were presented.

Mr. ALLEN. As they were presented.

Mr. HILL. As they were presented, then. That does not change the question. Neither shall I be led into any criticism of Mr. Debs himself. I have some respect for his utterances. Some of them have been patriotic. In many of them I concur, but I do not indorse all that he has said since the unfortunate controversy arose in which he took so prominent a part. I have nothing but the kindliest feelings toward Mr. Debs, who is a man of ability, a man of capacity, a man who is trusted by a large number of people in the United States; but when the Senate of the United States undertakes an investigation it should not in its resolution especially mention a particular case. Let me read the resolution and call the attention of the Senate to it. It is as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators shall be appointed who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into the imprisonment of Eugene V. Debs for an alleged contempt of court, who shall report to the Senate and recommend such legislation as may be necessary for the just enforcement of the law and the protection of citizens from arbitrary and oppressive exercise of judicial power.

There is an intimation in that resolution that possibly in this particular case there was an arbitrary and oppressive exercise of judicial power. I do not think it wise to raise a special committee so long as the object can be accomplished in another and more appropriate way, by a general resolution requiring the Judiciary Committee to investigate the whole subject of contempts of court, with such recommendations of legislation as may be necessary. It strikes me that is the better course to pursue. In the end the subject will be duly investigated, and if legislation is needed it will be reported. That, it strikes me, is all that the Senator from Florida ought to ask.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator from New York takes his seat, I should like to put him one question. Does the Senator expect, if his resolution goes to the Judiciary Committee, that it will ever be heard from again?

Mr. HILL. I do; and I think the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is entirely uncalled for. I think the Judiciary Committee, of which I happen to be a member, will take up this case and decide it and make a report upon it. Will the Senator intimate what reasons he has for thinking that the committee will not report?

Mr. ALLEN. I have not intimated that it will not.

Mr. HILL. I do not know, then, what the Senator meant.

Mr. ALLEN. I do, however, now intimate that that committee will not. I had not said so or suggested so before, although I believed so. I now say that I believe it is the intention in the offering of this substitute to send the resolution to the Judiciary Committee for the express purpose of never hearing from it again.

I have not been here very long, Mr. President—a little over two years—but I have noticed every time that a Senator wants to get rid of a resolution that is objectionable to him he asks the Senate to send it to a standing committee, especially if he happens to be a member of it; and 99 per cent, perhaps not that much, but 95 per cent of all the decent, respectable resolutions that were introduced in the Senate in the last Congress and were sent to the standing committees had never been heard from until the close of the Congress, when they were perfunctorily reported and rejected. That is the reason I make the statement.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator assert that any standing committee of this body, empowered and directed to make an investigation upon a subject like this, has not proceeded to execute the power conferred upon it?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, go into the caverns around this Capitol and see for yourself.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will please answer my question.

Mr. ALLEN. I do.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator name one?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not stand here and recall them. They were introduced here by the dozen and by the hundred. I can not even recall now all the resolutions I have introduced.

Mr. HILL. The Senator said "decent and respectable resolutions."

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly. I meant by that, Mr. President, those resolutions which have merit in them. I say that 95 per cent of them—and they have been introduced here by the basketful—have gone into the dark recesses and caverns of this Capitol and have never been heard from again.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Resolutions proposing investigations, which are referred to a committee, are referred, of course, for the purpose of having the committee determine the question of the propriety of the investigation. They are an entirely different class of resolutions from those which on their face direct an investigation. In this case both the original resolution of the Senator from Florida and the substitute offered by me direct an investigation. It is not proposed to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of seeing whether there shall be an investigation, although that might, I think, under the circumstances, be done with propriety; but both the resolution and the substitute contemplate simply an investigation, one by a special committee appointed, mentioning a particular case and a particular name, and the other by simply referring the whole subject to a standing committee of this body, without naming any particular case.

Mr. ALLEN. What is there about that matter that the Judiciary Committee should investigate?

Mr. HILL. It relates to a judicial question.

Mr. ALLEN. It does not relate to a judicial question at all in the sense in which the Judiciary Committee is organized. There is no question about it that the Judiciary Committee should investigate. Does the Senator from New York claim that there are no lawyers in this Chamber outside of the Judiciary Committee, or even Senators who are not lawyers, who are not competent to pass upon the policy of adopting this resolution?

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator had introduced a bill relating to the subject of contempts, would he not have recognized the propriety of its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. ALLEN. I would not have recognized the propriety. I would have recognized that the rule required it, and that is all.

Mr. HILL. Then perhaps the Senator had better suggest a resolution abolishing all committees.

Mr. ALLEN. I would not abolish all committees, but I would reorganize them, if I had it in my power, so as to do business. I do not go to the extent that my friend from Florida goes. I do not see how it is possible to do business in this Chamber without committee organization.

Mr. CALL. Permanent committees.

Mr. ALLEN. Permanent committees. Yet I can not help but be impressed with this thought, gathered from my little experience here, that this Chamber is organized not to do business. That is the purpose of its organization all the time.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I do not wish to participate in this discussion, but I would ask the privilege of calling the attention of Senators on this side of the Chamber to an announcement made by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] the other day that he would submit some remarks at this hour and would inquire of the Senators who are participating in this debate whether they would be willing for the pending resolution to lie over?

Mr. HILL. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

Mr. CALL. I will consent to that, the resolution retaining its place by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not recall the fact that my colleague had announced that he would address the Senate at this hour. I yield the floor to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will go over, retaining its place. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I thank Senators upon both sides of the Chamber for the extension of this courtesy.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I thank Senators upon both sides of the Chamber for the extension of this courtesy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions reported by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], from the Committee on Foreign Relations; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions reported by Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, January 20, 1896, as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That whereas President Monroe, in his message to Congress of December 2, A. D. 1823, deemed it proper to assert as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, were thenceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power; and

Whereas President Monroe further declared in that message that the United States would consider any attempt by the allied powers of Europe to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety; that with the existing colonies and dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and should not interfere, but that with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States; and further reiterated in that message that it is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; and

Whereas the doctrine and policy so proclaimed by President Monroe have since been repeatedly asserted by the United States by Executive declaration and action upon occasions and exigencies similar to the particular occasion and exigency which caused them to be first announced, and have been ever since their promulgation, and now are, the rightful policy of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the United States of America reaffirms and confirms the doctrine and principles promulgated by President Monroe in his message of December 2, A. D. 1823, and declares that it will assert and maintain that doctrine and those principles, and will regard any infringement thereof, and particularly any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new or additional territory on the American continents, or any island adjacent thereto, or any right of sovereignty or dominion in the same in any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety by or through force, purchase, cession, occupation, pledge, colonization, protectorate, or by control of the easement in any canal or any other means of transit across the American Isthmus, whether under unfounded pretension of right in cases of alleged boundary disputes or under any other unfounded pretensions, as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States and as an interposition which it would be impossible in any form for the United States to regard with indifference.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I have been so lately called from private life to public affairs that it were perhaps more seemly on my part to leave all present discussion of the Monroe doctrine to those whose recognized abilities and long public service enable them most certainly to command the attention of the country. But, sir, I am called upon at the very outset of my official term to assume most grave and unusual responsibilities. The adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs will present a great international issue which may hold much of menace to the world's peace; an issue which I sincerely hope and profoundly believe will be resolved to the abiding peace and honor and permanency of this Republic, but which, it is useless to deny, might precipitate upon our beloved country all the disasters and horrors and sacrifices which would inevitably follow should the two great English-speaking nations of the globe remit their differences to the arbitrament of arms. I can not assume these responsibilities; I dare not vote for the pending resolution without first submitting to the deliberate judgment of mankind and the dispassionate criticism of posterity some of the reasons which seem to make my path of duty plain.

Were there nothing at stake but a mere adjustment of a boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, I should hesitate long and seriously before voting to commit this Government to any interference. It is difficult to believe, and impossible to demonstrate, that our honor is involved, our prestige threatened, or our tranquillity disturbed by any disposition which can possibly be made of a distant strip of South American marsh and mountain. But, sir, the present question rises high above any Venezuelan dispute. The British prime minister, the accredited mouthpiece of the strongest empire of Christendom, has seen fit to officially declare, and so advises this Government, that the Monroe doctrine has no place in the law of nations and is not accepted or recognized by the European powers. The challenge thus broadly thrown down by Great Britain must be taken up by this Republic, or the Monroe doctrine is a thing of the past. The world is waiting to know whether that great declaration of American policy is living or dead. The world is waiting to know whether it is to be respected, maintained, and enforced, or abandoned and despised. The people of this country look to the Congress of the United States to make answer in their behalf. They expect that answer to breathe the same spirit of American patriotism as did the answer of Ethan Allen at Ticonderoga; as did the answer of Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence; as did the liberty bell of 1776.

Mr. President, the British position, bluntly, almost insolently, stated by Lord Salisbury, has been reasserted from this floor, clothed in such splendid rhetoric and presented with such fervid eloquence as even to win American applause. I unhesitatingly assume that the applause was for the matchless ability of the orator and not for the sentiment of his address. I can not believe that the views of the Senator from Colorado will commend themselves to the deliberate judgment of the American people. They may be satisfactory to the money changers. England can crack the whip for them, but, thank God, the money changers are not the custodians of the national conscience. They may be approved by Wall street, for Wall street represents that powerful foreign syndicate which seeks to dominate the financial and industrial policy of this country, but Wall street can not dictate to the Senate of the United States. If our people ever become so senile and degraded as to be willing to list the honor of the nation on the stock exchange, to go up or down with the market, it will be time to turn the pictured face of Washington to the wall and to cast the sword of Grant into the sea. [Applause in Galleries.]

Mr. President, I have the most profound admiration and respect for the Senator from Colorado. I know how intensely American he is. His patriotism can not be questioned or his sincerity doubted. I know how strong must be the convictions which lead him to lift his voice against the known sentiments of his countrymen. I know how little he cares for the good opinion of those who most applaud his effort. I even know that in his next advocacy of free coinage he will anathematize Great Britain and castigate the gold barons and stock jobbers of New York City. Withal he is so genial and lovable a character that it is positively painful to differ with him on any subject.

I agree with the Senator that this is no time to stir up public passion; to appeal to any prejudice that may exist against England; to fan the flame of any incipient war sentiment. But I must insist that this is a time of all others to call forth the highest expression of loyalty and devotion to American institutions. I must insist that this is the supreme hour for a dignified, positive, and solemn declaration of the American purpose, clearly, calmly, deliberately stated. Sir, the Monroe doctrine was announced by a President of the United States more than seven decades since. For almost three-quarters of a century it has stood as the established policy of the American people. It is our priceless inheritance from the fathers. We have grown to consider it as much a part of our form of government as is the Constitution of the United States. It is held in as great reverence by Americans as is Magna Charta by Englishmen. That it has never been formally approved by Congress is because it has never before been officially challenged by any other nation, nor has its application to the affairs of the Western Hemisphere been directly questioned.

It is not my purpose to treat this subject historically or to review the events which led up to the assertion of this American policy in the message of President Monroe. I could add nothing in that respect to the exhaustive presentation of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no doubt that the fear of the Holy Alliance and the knowledge of its purposes had much to do with its formulation and declaration; but there is nothing in the language employed by President Monroe which limits the application of the doctrine to resistance of the threatened aggression of the Holy Alliance. It has been universally considered and construed as pledging this country to oppose the extension of monarchical institutions in the Western Hemisphere, and also to protect every foot of American soil from further invasion, aggression, or dominion by any foreign power. If such was not the meaning and purpose of the Monroe doctrine as originally announced, then it is time now for a clear and explicit restatement of the American policy.

Mr. President, it is gravely argued that our country has outgrown the necessity for any further enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. It is urged that the United States has waxed strong and powerful; that we no longer need fear any foreign interference in our affairs; that all our boundary lines have been definitely settled; and that we can not be affected or disturbed by South American controversies. It is, therefore, insisted that we can now afford to let the other American Republics look out for themselves, and that we should stand supinely by while foreign powers overawe and outrage our weak and defenseless neighbors.

Mr. President, ours is the one great nation of this continent; Mother of Republics, her lullaby has been sung over every cradle of liberty in the New World. Under the inspiration of her glorious example, the last throne has disappeared from the Western Hemisphere and the Old World's dominion over American territory and American affairs will not outlast the morning of the twentieth century. [Applause.]

It is contended upon this floor that our neighboring republics are not worthy of our sympathy or assistance because of the instability of their established forms of government and of the ignorant and helpless character of their populations. When has the weakness and helplessness of the child ever justified abandonment by the mother? Unstable and imperfect as may be republican rule on a portion of the American Continent, yet any government that professes to be "of the people, by the people, and for the people" is better than the government of kings. And any country which has shown its ability to rid itself of despotism is worthy of our encouragement and substantial aid in all its struggles and all its efforts to secure for its people a greater measure of liberty, enlightenment, and civilization than they now enjoy.

Mr. President, the God of nations has made our country strong and mighty. She is the only American power able to stand protector for the New World. That same Providence which has blessed us with its gracious favor has placed us in the position of responsibility and guardianship toward the weaker American Republics. We can not shirk our obligations as a nation; we can not absolve ourselves from the performance of those duties which Providence has imposed upon us; and nothing but selfishness or cowardice can induce the people of the United States to desert the post of leadership in the affairs of the Western Hemisphere which it is their manifest destiny to retain.

I am not unmindful of the seriousness and gravity of the present situation. We are calling a halt upon that settled policy of aggression and dominion which has characterized the extension of the British Empire from the hour in which her first adventurous prow turned to unknown seas. The history of the English people is an almost unbroken series of military achievements. Great Britain has cleared her pathway into every corner of the earth with the naked sword; she has acquired and held her vast possessions by force of arms; she has mastered and subjugated the people of every zone; her navies are upon every sea, her armies in every clime. She has not a son who did not suckle inherited valor from his mother's breast. No nation can afford to lightly challenge her purposes or arouse her stubborn pride. But does this furnish any reason why Americans should abandon any settled policy of the United States, or retire from any position which the honor of this Republic and the welfare of America require that we should assume?

Mr. President, our people have been represented as eager for war, and the Senator from Colorado seems to believe that it is necessary to cool their ardor by disparagement of the Monroe doctrine and eulogium of British grandeur. Ours is a mighty nation, but its people are slow to wrath. They believe in the divine doctrine taught by the lowly Nazarine on the shores of Galilee. The fear of God, the love of peace is in their hearts and in their homes. Nothing that can be said, nothing that can be done, will move or incite them to any act of injustice or to any premature preparations for war. But there is no other land in which the honor of the nation is so dear; there is no other land in which the love of country, of liberty, and of justice is so strong; there is no other land whose citizens would sacrifice so much to maintain its institutions or defend its soil.

The people of this country have always been patient and long suffering under wrong. They have never provoked war, and have never taken up arms until driven to it for the preservation of their most sacred rights. War has only been waged by the people of this country four times in one hundred and twenty years of national existence: First, for independence; second, to compel respect for our flag on the high seas; third, to protect our Mexican frontier; and fourth, to preserve the Union. Is there anything in such a history which makes it necessary that the people of the United States should be urged to greater moderation?

Mr. President, I share with the Senator from Colorado in the heritage of English blood. I glory with him in the mighty achievements of the English-speaking race; but I have not forgotten that England, as a nation, compelled my ancestors in 1637 to cross the stormy ocean and take up habitation upon the rocky and inhospitable shores of the New England wilderness, in order that they might enjoy freedom of conscience and the worship of God according to their own beliefs. I have not forgotten that the persecution of Great Britain followed them across the sea; I have not forgotten that she heaped indignities and injustice upon the colonists until they could no longer be borne; I have not forgotten that my grandsires carried muskets, and gave their American blood, that British dominion over American colonies should be forever at an end. I have not forgotten that our sailors and marines were forced to drive England's navy from the main to make the deck of an American ship American soil.

Sir, Great Britain has mistaken the temper of the people of this country in the past as she mistakes it now. The English people profess to believe that they can weaken our purpose and compel us to abandon the Monroe doctrine by threats and demonstrations against American securities and American commercial interests. We solemnly advise them that our foreign policy is not a matter of exchange or barter; and no financial panic can ever induce us for a single moment to lower the standard of our national honor. They also profess to believe that the United States dare not stand by the Monroe doctrine at this time, because, they say, the people of the South would gladly take advantage of a declaration of war to renew the old internal contest.

Standing upon the floor of the American Senate and knowing whereof I speak, I say to the people of Great Britain that the grave issues which have been settled by brave men upon American battlefields can never be reopened. Sir, there is no division of sentiment in the United States. Let but a single drumbeat be heard upon our coast, announcing the approach of a foreign foe, and there will spring to arms in North and South the grandest army the world has ever known, animated by a deathless loyalty to their country's flag and marching on to the mingled and inspiring strains of our two national airs, Dixie and Yankee Doodle. [Manifestations of applause.]

Mr. President, the press of Great Britain has already seized upon the utterances of the Senator from Colorado as an indication that the people of this country are ready to abandon whatever place we now hold of duty and responsibility toward the republics and the affairs of the New World. But when the pending resolution comes on for final passage, I predict that it will be adopted by such a decisive vote as will advise all Christendom of the stand which the people of this country are prepared to make for the maintenance and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Sir, believing that the honor of my country is involved, that the hour calls for the highest expression of loyalty and patriotism, calmly confident of the verdict of posterity, reverently calling God to witness the sincerity of my purpose, I shall vote for the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I shall vote for it not as an affront to any other nation, but to uphold the dignity of my own. I shall vote for it in this time of profound tranquillity, convinced that peace with honor can be preserved. But, sir, I would vote for it just as surely were we already standing in the awful shadow of declared war. I would vote for it were the navies of all Europe thundering at our harbors. I would vote for it were the shells of British battle ships bursting above the dome of the nation's Capitol. I would vote for it and would maintain it at all hazards and at any cost, with the last dollar, with the last man; yea, though it might presage the coming of a mighty conflict whose conclusion should leave me without a son, as the last great contest left me without a sire. [Applause in the galleries.]

RAILWAY TRAFFIC AGREEMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEFFER, directing that the Interstate Commerce Commission inform the Senate whether there has been a custom, rule, regulation, or agreement long time existing among railroad companies and associations engaged in interstate traffic whose lines extend to or through Missouri River points.

Mr. PEFFER. I do not wish to detain the Senate a moment, Mr. President, on this resolution. I wish merely to say that it is one of very great importance, particularly to the people of my State. Recently our railway companies extending southward, carrying corn to Texas and to the Southern ports, have been compelled to raise the price of freight, simply because of the pressure brought upon them by Eastern railways, for the reason, and for the reason only, that it costs more to carry corn from Kansas City and other Missouri River points to New York City than to carry corn from the central points in Kansas to Galveston, the difference being some six or seven hundred miles. For that reason only the Eastern railway companies have brought such a pressure to bear upon our railways that they have been compelled to raise the price for transporting corn. I ask that the resolution may be adopted in order that we may have this investigation.

Mr. HILL. We can not hear what is going on upon this side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER on the 27th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether there has been a custom, rule, regulation, or agreement a long time existing among railway companies and associations engaged in interstate traffic whose lines extend to or through Missouri River points, which custom, rule, regulation, or agreement establishes and maintains different rates of charges for carrying passengers and freight east and west from said points, and whether such difference in charges is reasonable and warranted by law.

Second. Whether such agreement affects alike companies running through lines to and beyond said Missouri River points, as well as companies whose lines terminate there, giving the names of roads engaged in interstate traffic to and through such places.

Third. Whether an agreement or traffic arrangement was recently made or entered into by and between any railway companies or associations, naming them, whereby charges for carrying grain and other farm produce from points in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory to points in Texas and Mexico were advanced; whether such advance charges are now in force; what was the reason or purpose of the advance, and whether it is reasonable or unreasonable and in violation of the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Fourth. Whether, in case these agreements have been made and these proceedings had, there is, in the opinion of the Commission, any additional legislation required to better protect the public interests.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the resolution ought to go to a committee. We ought not to pass a resolution of this kind making all the inquiries suggested without at least the approval of some committee.

Mr. PEFFER. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce or some other proper committee to see what the investigation involves. We have been too much in the habit recently in the Senate of passing long resolutions of inquiry which entail enormous expense upon the Government without the slightest idea as to what the information is to be used for, or the value of the information when it is obtained. I do not mean to say that this resolution belongs to that class, but it certainly ought to have the approval of some standing committee before it is passed by the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. Only a few weeks ago I had the honor to offer a resolution of a somewhat similar character, but on a much broader basis, and it was permitted to pass the Senate without any sort of objection at all. It went to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in a few days we had a full and complete answer. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that this resolution calls for information which no other body or tribunal can give so soon, so accurately, and so acceptably to the author of the resolution as the Interstate Commerce Commission. It possesses all the facts, and I do not possess them in such a manner that I can use them advantageously here or elsewhere.

Mr. ALDRICH. It may be very proper that this inquiry should be made, but certainly the resolution should receive the approval of some standing committee. I observe that the last clause of the resolution asks the Interstate Commerce Commission to report to the Senate whether, in their opinion, further legislation is desirable. That is a very great step in a wrong direction, it seems to me. We are responsible to the American people for legislation and for the inception of legislation, and the idea of gravely asking a subordinate commission as to whether they think that some legislation should be adopted appears to me to be very unwise.

Mr. PEFFER. I am perfectly willing that that clause shall be stricken out. What I wanted——

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It certainly will be reported by that committee very promptly; and if there is anything of value (as I have no doubt there is, from the Senator's statement) in the inquiry to be made, the inquiry will then be made with more force as coming from a standing committee.

Mr. PEFFER. I think that is all true, but my experience in such resolutions has been such as to make me feel intensely the importance of direct action upon matters similar to this one. I once offered a resolution asking for information from the Interstate Commerce Committee of this body. The resolution was referred to that committee and I never heard of it afterwards. While I do not wish in any manner to reflect upon that committee, still I would prefer to have the resolution adopted just as it is.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas to strike out the fourth branch of the resolution——

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly think that would be a very wise amendment to adopt.

Mr. HOAR. And then allow the resolution to pass. While it is quite necessary for the Senate to look with care and scrutiny upon resolutions which are calculated to impose large expense and cost on the Departments in answering them, especially on resolutions which affirm facts before they are investigated, as they sometimes do, this resolution is, I think, within the ordinary custom of the Senate in its respect to individual Senators. If any Senator on this floor desires for his instruction facts such as the Senator from Kansas asks for here, as a matter of course the Senate ought to have the proper inquiry made in his behalf. This is simply an inquiry as to what is the existing custom or rule or regulation of certain transcontinental railroads or railroads dealing with interstate commerce in regard to a very important matter. I suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission would answer it if a private note were addressed to them, but that would not give it the formality of a public document and it would not afford the convenience of having it printed. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will allow the resolution to go through with the final clause stricken out.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Massachusetts must have noticed, as well as I have myself, the very great frequency with which long and elaborate resolutions of inquiry have been adopted by the Senate during the present session. We have adopted resolutions of inquiry of the various Departments since the first Monday of December last which can be safely said within bounds will cost the Government of the United States $100,000 to answer. I remember a single inquiry made of the District Commissioners in regard to which they replied that it would require $20,000 in clerical force to answer the questions.

The Senator from Massachusetts states what everyone in the Senate knows to be perfectly true, that any Senator by writing a note to the Interstate Commerce Commission can get the information, if it is proper information to have, as easily and as well as if the Senate were to adopt the formality of a resolution of that kind. What useful public purpose can be served by the Senate allowing itself to be used—I am not using the word offensively—to make all sorts of inquiries which any man inside of the Senate Chamber or outside of the Senate Chamber desires to have made for any purpose? If this is simply a matter of inquiry, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, let it go to the standing committee of this body that has been in the habit of dealing with questions of this kind, and if it is a proper resolution of inquiry they will certainly report it back promptly.

I am not undertaking to make any special objection in this case, but so far as I have any influence over the matter that rule ought to be followed, and it shall be followed in all cases, so that the Government may not be burdened and the various Departments may not be burdened by answering elaborate resolutions of inquiry when in many cases it may be that no great public purpose will be served. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 2904.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, on which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote may be had on the pending bill and amendments on Thursday next at, say, 2 o'clock.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield for an inquiry?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I ask what, if any, objection exists to fixing the time for the vote at some hour to-morrow instead of Thursday? I am impelled to make this inquiry by what seems to be a necessity requiring the absence of myself and my colleague on Thursday. Unless some good reason exists for continuing the discussion beyond to-morrow I should be much pleased to see to-morrow named instead of Thursday.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand that some Senators are now absent who expect to be here Thursday. I had previously asked to have a vote on Thursday and had given notice that I would ask the Senate to remain in session Thursday until the bill shall be disposed of. Those Senators being absent now, I presume there would be objection to undertaking to take a vote before their return. Besides there are, to my certain knowledge, a number of Senators who desire to make speeches, all of whom I think will have ample time to do so between now and 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. CARTER. What will be the objection, then, to continuing the discussion until Friday and taking the vote at some hour Friday afternoon?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be glad to know if there can be consent to any hour on Thursday. I earnestly hope there will be no objection and that there will be no postponement beyond Thursday. The bill has been here some time; I have been as courteous as possible to Senators who desired to have time to prepare for speeches, and I think there ought not to be any further delay.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not intend to object to having a day fixed for disposing of the bill. I think it is desirable that a day should be named for that purpose. I do object, however, to an agreement in the form suggested by the Senator from Arkansas. His proposition is that at 2 o'clock on the day agreed upon the bill and amendments shall then be voted upon. I suppose he means without further debate?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That was my proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator to modify his request so that after a given hour the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the bill and proposed amendments under the five-minute rule as to debate, with an understanding, if the Senate chooses to give it, that the bill shall be completed upon that date. It is objectionable, it seems to me, to shut off all debate on the bill itself and on amendments instantly at a given hour.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I recognize the reasonableness of the Senator's proposition, and I am willing to modify the suggestion in accordance with what he has just stated.

Mr. CHANDLER. That at a given hour the consideration of the bill and amendments shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. And with the understanding that the bill shall be completed during that day.

Mr. HARRIS. What shall be the given hour—2 o'clock?

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not want to anticipate that, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee. The day has not yet been agreed upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Concerning this matter, I simply desire to observe that I had intended to submit some observations on the bill, but inasmuch as I am much more anxious that the revenue bill shall come before the Senate for action than any bill involving the free coinage of silver, I will not trouble the Senate to make any remarks concerning the bill now under consideration, and will very gladly agree to a vote on this particular measure at as early a day or hour as is possible.

Mr. HILL. I am advised that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] desires to submit some remarks on the pending measure, and but a very short time ago the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] informed me that he hoped to be able to speak to-morrow, and if not to-morrow, the next day. Under these circumstances it does not seem to be possible for us to now agree upon a time at which the vote shall be taken. I think it very likely that a vote can be had on Thursday next; but at this time I can not consent to such an agreement as is proposed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from New York will not object to a definite understanding. It is a very material matter. So far as I am concerned, I have endeavored to observe the wishes of Senators. During the three weeks the bill has been here I have not urged any action, and when Senators have come and said to me that they would like time for preparation, I have time after time agreed that the Senate might adjourn, until I feel that I have made myself censurable to some extent for not pressing this measure more vigorously. I now hope the Senator from New York will not interpose any objection, but that we may have an agreement to vote on Thursday. I shall not ask anything as to the particular hour if I can have unanimous consent to vote on that day.

Mr. HILL. I cheerfully bear testimony to the courtesy of the Senator from Arkansas who has charge of the pending bill. He has certainly endeavored to extend to those who desire to speak every possible opportunity. There have been speeches made nearly every day during reasonable hours upon the bill; but, as a number of Senators still desire to speak, I can not, in the present situation, assent to the proposed agreement at this time. I said before, and I repeat now, that I hope we may be able to come to some agreement to take a vote on the bill on Thursday, but I am not prepared now to assent to an agreement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then, I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to remain in session on Thursday until the pending bill is disposed of; and I hope that the friends of the bill and all other Senators favoring the dispatch of business of the Senate will come on that day with the intention of staying until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer at the proper time an amendment as an additional section to the amendment reported by the committee. I ask that it be read, and then ordered to be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill, as section 5, the following:

That after the 1st of July, 1896, all bank notes issued by national banking associations shall be redeemed in coin when presented for redemption to the national banking association issuing the same, and any such national banking association failing to redeem these notes on presentation shall be dissolved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be ordered to be printed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] for a moment, if I may have it. Referring to the suggestion made by that Senator that on Thursday next he would ask the Senate to remain in session until a vote was reached on the bond bill, I beg to appeal to the Senator not to put the physical test of endurance upon the members of the Senate who would vote for his amendment, or those who would vote against it. I understand perfectly well, as do almost all the Senators in this Chamber, that this hastening of a vote was agreed to by the Senator from Arkansas not alone because of his unflinching and earnest advocacy of the amendment which he has reported, but that he agreed to it as well at the earnest request of Senators on both sides of the Chamber who are opposed to bimetallism, to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and who have from time to time expressed the fear that the friends of free coinage in this body were endeavoring to stifle a vote and to postpone legislation. We have heard again and again that it was the silver people, so called, who were endeavoring to stave off a vote upon this bond question.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] objects to a vote. I have nothing to criticise respecting his utterance, for he is entirely within the line of his duty, but it ought to be understood that it is not the advocates of silver who are objecting to a vote upon the bond bill. We have been told upon this side of the Chamber by Senators from the East, and very properly told, that the country desires some sort of legislation, and that it is necessary that it should be known what position the Senate is going to take. In view of that, as well as because of his advocacy of his amendment, the Senator from Arkansas, I understand, agreed that we should have a speedy vote.

That agreement met a hearty indorsement on this side of the Chamber by the advocates and opponents of free coinage. But any attempt at this session to precipitate a vote by physical force, against the wish of anybody to speak upon the question, would seem to me hardly well taken; and if those Senators from the East who are opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, who are telling us of the great sufferings the country is undergoing because of the procrastinating tactics of the silver people, are willing to assume the responsibility of postponing, day after day and week after week, a vote on this measure, I do not think the friends of silver ought to be called upon to come here nights and help dispose of the measure.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Wyoming to allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas whether he would not at least make one more effort, by asking unanimous consent that after Thursday—say, at 3 o'clock—the debate shall proceed by ten-minute speeches only. I think if the Senate would give that consent, it would be a great step forward; and if it should turn out that any particular Senator who had made a special study, the result of which he wished to communicate, desired the time extended, undoubtedly he would get the consent of the Senate for additional time; but if we could have a general understanding that there should be a debate limited to ten minutes on the part of each Senator, I think it would probably meet the wishes of Senators on both sides.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be glad to do anything to satisfy the views of different Senators and to avoid any friction. It is not an unusual thing for the Senate to come here with a general-consent agreement that Senators will stay until a measure in hand is disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. When such understandings are had, it is usual for the Senate to adjourn about 5 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not understand the last remark of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I said when the Senate made such an arrangement my experience was that they always, in spite of it, adjourned about 5 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In my experience I never saw a case where they did.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the ten-minute debate commence on Thursday at some hour to be fixed, and that we reach a general understanding that the final vote on the bill and amendments be taken not later than Monday—that the bill shall be disposed of at least by Monday.

Mr. HILL. I do not know exactly who has the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HILL. I ask the consent of the Senator from Wyoming to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. I do not understand that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] referred to me when he said that certain Senators from the East charge the so-called free-silver Senators with efforts to delay the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may interrupt the Senator, certainly not. How could I accuse the Senator of that when he was upon the floor asking for further time? I had no thought of the Senator from New York in what I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I recollect that last week there were certain Senators who intimated that the friends of the bill were not ready to vote. There was nothing beyond that said. I think those Senators are not now in their seats. I am not called upon to defend them or say anything in that regard.

So far as the Senator from Arkansas is concerned, he is at liberty to take any course he sees fit. I do not object, so far as I am concerned, to his statement that he wants the friends of the measure to remain here. I repeat, I express the hope that we may be able to come to an agreement whereby some vote may be had on Thursday, but I insist upon it that until we can see the end of the debate—and there are so many Senators who desire to speak that it is difficult to see the end—I can not consent, so far as I am concerned, to the proposed agreement.

I have not yet asked the Senate for the privilege of speaking, and I do not ask the Senator from Colorado for the privilege of speaking upon this bill. If I want to speak upon it I shall speak, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Wyoming for just one more moment of time, I will now act on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and ask unanimous consent that after 3 o'clock on Thursday the debate on the bill and amendments shall be confined to ten minutes to each Senator.

Mr. HILL. I do not see why the Senator from Arkansas is insisting upon that vote. I have stated, and now state again, that I can not consent to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have not before asked that, and I do not understand how the Senator could have objected to it before it was asked for.

Mr. HILL. I object to any agreement being made to take a vote on Thursday, in the present status of affairs.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not ask a vote, but I ask for an agreement that the debate after 3 o'clock on Thursday shall be confined to ten-minute speeches, without saying anything as to how long the debate shall continue.

Mr. GRAY. No matter how long the debate may continue. I hope the Senator from New York will not object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then, I hope, for the purpose of giving Senators an opportunity to make such speeches as they want, that the Senate will sit late each day from now on, so as to give every Senator who desires an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask what was the result of the request for unanimous consent? Was any agreement arrived at?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection was interposed, and no agreement has been reached. The Senator from Wyoming is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am glad that the matter is definitely settled in some way for the present, and I am glad that I have the opportunity of submitting in a general way only a few remarks on the pending proposition, a proposition not at all political in its nature, but one that equally affects all parties, one that has in effect and in various forms been before our people for many years, one that vitally interests every producer and every consumer in the land, but one which has seemed to arouse ill will and sharp retort only, when it, of all questions, should receive candid discussion and deliberate consideration. When the time shall come that we can discuss the money proposition with the same calm minds with which we approach other matters and questions of national import, then, and not till then, can we hope for a final and just conclusion and determination of the financial problem.

I shall not attempt to discuss the silver question in detail in this Chamber to-day or at any other time—that has been done fully and often by those who are qualified to undertake the task. I will only say that I have tried to arrive at a just and honest conviction in my own mind that should determine how my vote should be cast when in the line of my duty I should be called upon to vote, and after the examination I have made, after investigating as fully as my opportunities and abilities will allow, I can only come to the conclusion that our fathers before 1873 had a juster and better idea as to the financial system that would benefit all classes of our people than their sons have seemed to develop since that time. The American people are beginning to take this silver question seriously and I venture the assertion that twelve months' honest and fair discussion of the proposition with an intelligent and reasonable presentation of both sides of the question in the daily and weekly press, on the farms, at the crossroads, in the counting rooms, and elsewhere, would result in such a turning over of the single-standard people that the day of Pentecost would sink into insignificance as a day of conversion from erroneous ways. We would then awake to the consciousness that the Creator made no mistake when he poured gold and silver side by side into the giant mountains and decreed that they should form the lifeblood of commerce and trade among the peoples of the earth for ages to come; as I say, if this subject could be approached in candor and fairness I believe all would be silver men in twelve months. The difficulty has been that the issue has been clouded with passion and epithet, with foolish words and real or affected distrust.

We who believe in silver have been taunted as fiatists and cranks and dishonest politicians, who for personal ends and political purposes seek to dishonor our currency and depreciate the value of the dollar. Do you believe a word of such vituperation? Do you, my hard-money friend on that or this side of the Chamber, really believe that those who oppose you in your desire to issue gold bonds and thus discredit and depreciate every former obligation of the Government are fiatists? Do you think we want a cheap dollar simply because we demand an honest dollar? Do you really believe that we are less patriotic than you because we advocate a system that gave Great Britain the financial control of the world, and which she only abandoned when the greed of her bankers overshadowed the welfare of her common people, even as she abandoned protection at the demand of the few and at the expense of the many after years of that policy had made her the industrial ruler of the world, a policy to which she must soon return in sheer self-defense? Do you believe that we are less patriotic than you because we advocate a financial system that enabled France with the elasticity of the young gladiator to wipe out in an incredibly short space of time the effects of the most destructive of modern European wars? Are we less patriotic than you because we favor a plan that accords with nature, and which logic and history alike indorse?

The present situation is intensified by the arrogant and hostile bearing assumed by those who make their fortunes and increase their store by trading in the dire extremity of the nation; because a Senator sworn to his duty makes known to the people by his vote directly or indirectly his views upon the silver question, if such views happened to differ from the interests of those who speculate in cold blood upon the unfortunate conditions of our country, and who would add to our miseries by forcing upon us additional indebtedness and interest-bearing burdens, at that moment the metropolitan press, drawing inspiration from the gamblers and speculators of Wall street or "Pinchers alley," open their batteries in libelous denunciation. A campaign of vituperation and abuse is at once begun, and every method known is used to bend the back of Congress to the burden Wall street would impose. Not content to subject individual Senators to the lash for daring to withstand their plans of greed and disaster, discredit is sought to be thrown upon the States they represent, and Eastern bankers and business firms are urged to lessen their credits and withdraw business favors from States represented, or, as they choose to call it, misrepresented by Senators in favor of the currency of the better days of the Republic.

In its issue of December 28 one of the leading dailies of New York puts forth a column and more of personal attack upon 24 "silver Senators," dealing with them without regard to truth or decency. In its wisdom it hits upon what it considers a proper and effective way of dealing with these disturbers of the nation's serenity; it proposes an embargo on the merchants and bankers of the East, it threatens the business men of the West and South with calamity unless they shall muzzle their Senators. The Senator from Georgia read a portion of this article in his speech of yesterday, allow me to read still another portion:

> The New York business men said they believed that the constituents of the 24 Senators who have joined hands with the silver men should either through the legislatures of the States they represent or through the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce in the cities of those States demand of these 24 that they cease misrepresenting them in matters of financial legislation at Washington and come out hearty and strong for sound money. It is declared that some such line of action should be adopted at once in order to bring these 24 Senators to their senses, and it is even said that this must be done if the merchants and others represented by these 24 men are to be well considered in the matter of credits with New York and Eastern merchants generally. The false light in which these 24 Senators have put the business men of their States has deterred Eastern manufacturers and business men from extending lines of credit, even though they are convinced that these Senators do not rightly represent their constituents. It does not matter, it was continued, that some of these Senators are shortly to be retired to private life. They should be called to account at once just the same. Those who are interested in directing the attention of the constituents of these 24 Senators to their conduct at Washington and urging a sharp protest against it point out specifically just how flagrant is the conduct of these Senators.

Then, after castigating each of these 24 Senators by name, the article concludes with the threat that "still there's more to follow."

> The question is being agitated also as to what methods should be used against United States Senators who get to Washington and misrepresent every interest in their States. The complaint of the New York business men and the demand that the constituents of these 24 delinquent United States Senators call on them for an understanding will be heard more of in the future.

Since this publication the same great daily, joined by other New York sheets, has day by day, editorially and otherwise, attacked these Senators by name and in detail, descending to bitter personal abuse, for want of argument, to support the gold position, urging, time and again, withdrawals of credits and business favors from the States represented by these Senators, because they have assumed to differ from the money controllers of the city of New York on the coinage question.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that the gold monometallist hopes to use this sort of argument to convince the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber? The gentlemen of Wall street are mistaken if for one moment they fancy that any game of bluff will carry the day with the American people. If this nation is to be finally and completely committed to the gold standard, that has resulted in good and gain only to those already rich, and has worked further unbounded poverty to all besides, the world over, some other argument must be used beyond the "stand and deliver" of the highwayman. I am against the House measure, Mr. President, and with my present light shall be opposed to any like measure coming before this Senate. I favor this substitute or amendment proposed by the Finance Committee because I believe in America and in her ability to care for herself against the world.

The patriotism of this nation has never failed when the final test came, and in my judgment, Mr. President, the day is not far distant when the entire financial system will, through the demand of a long-suffering people, finally adjust itself on thoroughly American lines. As Americans, by force of arms we accomplished political independence and separation from the greatest political power on the earth; by the arts of peace and under the influences of a protective tariff we gained our position of industrial independence of the greatest manufacturing and commercial nation the world has ever known; and I have faith to believe that in the near future, as the American people reflect that the fathers were wise, they will come to the belief that the same great minds that conceived the grand ideas of an American Republic set in motion also a system of finance sufficient for all the needs of that Republic, a system that carried us safely through domestic and foreign wars and was sufficient for all our remarkable commercial growth in times of peace—the people, I say, remembering these things, will demand financial independence as well as political.

Nothing can be added to the arguments advanced on this question during the past ten years. The minds of those who have made the closest and most candid study of the question have been led to the support of the double standard, no matter from what point of view they started; their arguments have been met for ten years by prophecies and predictions only, and by prophecies and predictions that have invariably failed. Their arguments can not be overturned by personal attack in city press nor by threats of the withdrawal of business favor. If met at all they must be met by open argument or historical results; the people will accept no other course.

I hope the time will soon come, Mr. President, when this nation will be freed from the chains forged by syndicates and speculators; when the public credit will not be bandied about by any man or set of men for individual greed; when we as a nation will have the nerve and disposition to regulate our own financial affairs. Surely, Mr. President, if we are strong enough to say to England, "Hands off in Venezuela," we are strong enough to adopt and carry on a coinage system without gaining consent of England to our plan. I say, Mr. President, I hope the day will soon come when this nation will regulate its own affairs without the interposition of any other nation on earth, and when syndicate bond issues with their attendant scandals will be a thing of the past, and I am convinced that the vote of this Chamber in favor of this amendment will hasten that day.

It is true that the people seem to have been chloroformed into a state of monometallism; my gold-money friends have apparently hypnotized them with all the diabolical skill of a Svengali; but if they have suffered, you, like Svengali, have exhausted yourselves with the effort. The mistaken exercise of your power has carried destruction and desolation in its wake. You, my Eastern friends, have succeeded in establishing a single standard in this nation, but you have not escaped its deadly, blighting effect. The railways reaching all over our land are crippled and bankrupt, and your railway stocks go begging in the market and on the exchange, the legitimate prey of the rapacious money changers at whose behest the present financial system was inaugurated. Your policy has depreciated 25 per cent in value every farm in all our land, but at the same time the farm securities in your safes have fallen to a still lower basis. Every producer, mechanic, and laborer is eating his bread in despondency and without hope, but at the same time your capital invested in active industrial enterprise has suffered beyond compare. You can not escape the results of your action in the past. It is not yet too late to stay the devastating tide. If you are sincere, as I know you are, to free our Republic from the grasp of the speculator, the gold gambler, and the foreign syndicate, why not ally yourselves with their foes instead of hobnobbing with their friends. If you are jealous of the credit of our nation, do not trust it to the tender mercies of those whose every movement is an assault upon our Treasury, men without patriotism or love of country, whose sole desire seems to be for sordid gain, and whose rallying banner is not the flag with the stars upon its azure field, but is a standard inscribed only with the bar sinister of the English pound.

And why should we follow England in her financial system? Her thirst for gold is at the seat of all her present troubles. Wherever she is now involved is found the yellow metal; wherever she attempts to push her unjust claims the gold is her objective point; whether she pushes her advances in Venezuela against the young Republic in our southern continent, or seeks our own possessions in Alaska, or quarrels over African lands with her continental kinsmen, the golden fields are at the bottom of every controversy; and pursuing such a course it will, in my poor judgment, require a stronger brain than that of the great Salisbury himself to guide her ship of state clear of the rocks of national humiliation.

The great financiers, clamoring even now for gold bonds, prating in such high-sounding terms about our national credit, and disputing the honesty of purpose and personal integrity of any who may differ from their views or possible interests, outshylock, as it were, the patron saint of usurers himself. Shakspeare's Shylock demanded but the letter of his bond, but these of later days are made of sterner and more unpitying stuff—they demand not only the pound of Christian flesh, but still draw drop by drop the life blood of the nation—for them the people must thirst and hunger and slave, because they, forsooth, are so jealous of our public credit that they deem it would be dishonorable to pay our indebtedness in the same kind of money as is nominated in the bond. Oh, for some Chief Executive or Secretary of the Treasury, Democratic or Republican, with enough nerve and sufficient Americanism to say to these despoilers: "The letter of your bond shall be fulfilled, we will discharge every obligation you present in current coin. More than this you can not honestly demand; more than this we will in no wise grant." If such should be the course pursued, how long would Treasury notes be presented for redemption? The only object for the endless exchange now going on of greenbacks and other obligations for gold is purely speculative, and every Senator knows this to be the fact.

But, Mr. President, I have spoken more than I should, my only object being to define my own position. I am as firm a believer in sound money as any Senator here, but I reject the right of Wall street or Rothschild to force upon my judgment their own definition of what sound money is. I believe in honest money as well as sound money; the two must be identical; and that can not be dishonest money which is used to pay a bond which is the very creator of the bond itself. This is the ground upon which I stand, and no scurrilous attack of metropolitan press, no insinuations of personal interest shall drive me from this position. I am no inflationist, no fiatist, but on this measure I record my hostility to any financial scheme which proposes to issue our governmental obligations to pay current expenses and my opposition to that system which in my judgment has wrought ruin and desolation to the people of our Republic; that can only result in making the rich richer and the poor poorer, and now and here I declare myself without hesitation in favor of the policy that made us great as a nation and prosperous as individuals; that brought us through wars, both foreign and domestic, and which received the approbation and support of the great founders of our Republic.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I rise to-day to indulge in a short talk, rather than for the purpose of making a speech of more elaborate pretensions. We are in the crisis of a financial revolution inaugurated twenty-two years ago for the destruction of silver money and for the overthrow of the Constitution and the laws as they were framed and enacted on that subject by the founders of the Republic. Those who support the coinage and use of silver on the same terms with gold are not the agitators nor the disturbers of the peace of the country. They did not make the present issue. On the contrary, they are simply asking that the policy, the precepts, and the principles of those who made this Government and put it in operation be let alone. That is all.

The friends of silver as one of the money metals are now, and have been for nearly a quarter of a century, in an attitude of vigilant resistance, on guard, as it were, against those who seek to subvert the financial system of the fathers in the interest of corporations, speculating syndicates, and individual avarice. The enemies of silver money, those who plot its destruction, are alone responsible for the panics, the business troubles and depressions of the last twenty years and more, and for the disturbed condition of financial affairs at the present time. They alone have labored in season and out of season, in open fight and by secret, hidden methods, to disturb the harmony of the two precious metals, to destroy their parity, to put them at strife and variance, to break up their fraternal and cooperating relations in the business transactions of the country by discrediting and slandering one and unduly exalting the other.

The men who enacted the law of 1873 for the demonetization of silver were revolutionists with deliberate and premeditated malice against the settled, unbroken, and universally accepted policy of this Government from the beginning. They were wanton and unprovoked aggressors against the peace and welfare of the American people. Nor has their assault on silver then or at any time since had any other incentive or provocation than the desire to make money scarcer in the hands of the people, and thus double its purchasing power and value in the hands of the rich and grasping. Silver has been guilty of no sin against the prosperity of the country, either of omission or commission. It has never failed in standing at a parity with gold, and was a little better, about 3 per cent better, than gold in 1873. It was the sounder money of the two, if such a comparison is to be made, when the hour of its destruction drew nigh. Am I expected to speak with bated breath and in words of whispered humbleness in resisting to the utmost of my power the persistent self-seeking and unrelenting efforts now made for the extermination of silver money from our currency?

Sir, I appeal to history; I recur to the fountain head of patriotism and wisdom, and I invoke the sanction of the purest and best days of the Republic. With what respect, awe and reverence we look by the light of history into a meeting of Washington's Cabinet in the very beginning of our career. There we behold Washington himself, with his Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, and his Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, in deep consultation over the financial principles required for the strength, progress, safety, and glory of the new Government. It will hardly be contended, I think, that any other such Cabinet has, from that day to this, considered the subject of the finances. I am pointing now to the early part of the year 1792. The Government of the United States was then less than three years old. It was in the fullest sense of the term an infant in its swaddling clothes.

Washington's Cabinet, however, did not ask the cooperation or the permission of any other nation or nations or any international conference or agreement even then that the United States might coin gold and silver and maintain their parity at such ratio and on such conditions as was thought best for the American people. Jefferson and Hamilton were very American in spirit, and Washington intensely so. The act prepared by them, entitled "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States," which became a law April 2, 1792, was thoroughly American and was born of the spirit of American independence. It stooped to no foreign power, deferred to none, and leaned on none. It boldly proclaimed its own system of coinage without cringing or fear, and fixed the ratio between silver and gold at 15 to 1. Jefferson and Hamilton differed widely in regard to many of the fundamental principles of government, but on the great problem of finance they agreed and stood shoulder to shoulder in support of Washington's Administration. Hamilton, in his famous report to Congress in 1791, said:

> To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.

And Jefferson, in a letter to Hamilton, written in February, 1792, replied:

> I return you the report on the mint. I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals.

With Washington's approval of the act of 1792, embodying these views of Hamilton and Jefferson, the financial policy of this Government was established, and so remained through every vicissitude and trial of American history for a period of eighty-one years. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the only power that exists between the heavens above and the earth below to create money for the American people; "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." The great act of April 2, 1792, was the first exercise of this transcendent power by the men who had achieved American independence, framed the Constitution, and understood it. The lofty origin of gold and silver money in the United States is an old story, but it can not be too often repeated in plain and simple words, or too deeply impressed on the public mind.

The act of 1792, the immortal charter for the free coinage of gold and silver both, ought to be in the hands of every American. Nor was this act of a temporary character, or devised to meet temporary conditions. As the country grew and waxed strong in population, and in the development of its unparalleled resources the value and necessity of the double standard vindicated the wisdom of its authors, and made it permanent. In peace and in war, in all the great events of American history, the reliance of the people for final safety and deliverance has been upon the two metals as inseparable as the Siamese twins, and never on one metal alone. Within the first twenty-three years of our national existence, England, with deliberate design and premeditated revenge, forced her late American colonies to fight a second war for independence, which was closed by General Jackson, it will be remembered, at New Orleans.

The war with Mexico came thirty years later, with its vast and overwhelming results, and then, after an interval of only fifteen years, the convulsive and gigantic struggle for national life and union broke upon the country in the war of the rebellion. During all these perils and trials of financial strength no one spurned silver money; no one disparaged its use or impugned its honor; no one questioned the wisdom that put it in the Constitution and in the first financial measure enacted under the Constitution. For eighty-one years, from 1792 to 1873, no one talked of gold as the only sound money in existence, thereby stigmatizing the silver money of Washington's Administration as unsound.

The present cry of sound money applied to gold, and gold alone, is a fraud—a cheap, transparent fraud—in the face of every line of American history and in the face of existing facts this hour. It is true that gold is sound money, but so also is silver. No man dares to say in this presence that silver ever faltered or fell short in performing all the functions of money, or that it has ever stood for a single hour in American history at less than a parity with gold. Who has the audacity to assail such a currency as unsound? Even now, with every discrimination in the power of the Government against it, discredited and dishonored as far as possible by hostile legislation, and pursued by incessant and interested slander for more than twenty years past, the silver dollar has not gone to the rear among the business and laboring masses; it still remains the money of the fathers with the people, and whatever can be purchased with gold can be purchased at the same price with silver wherever the American flag flies and American law prevails.

Never before in the history of the world has a currency so persecuted, hunted down, and vilified by concentrated wealth and official sanction maintained such perfect rank and power in financial transactions. The truth is it is embedded in the confidence of the people and will never be dislodged. It is "money current with the merchant" now as it was in the days of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and has continued so to be in all the ages since. It is full and perfect legal tender to-day with which to meet every outstanding obligation against the Government, to pay every bond that demands payment, and to redeem every species of currency, every Treasury note, and every greenback that seeks redemption. Will it shock sensibilities and excite alarm in certain quarters if I ask why the debts of this Government may not be paid in one kind of lawful money as well as in another, when they are at a parity with each other? It would most effectually protect the hundred million gold reserve against the further premeditated, periodical raids of speculative marauders if the Government should exercise its unquestioned legal right to meet their unpatriotic demands for coin with silver.

The Government of France holds and exercises the option to pay her creditors in silver or in gold, according to the circumstances under which demand for payment is made, and France maintains the strongest and most reliable credit in Europe.

The same option exists by law in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and I do not hesitate to say that it ought to be exercised.

Who asserts that the silver dollar of Jefferson and Hamilton, unimpaired in purchasing power or as standard money, is not good enough in quality to tender to the money sharks and sharpers of the world when they enter the Treasury with hostile and mercenary designs against the gold reserve? There are Senators on this floor to-day who were members of Congress, here and at the other end of the Capitol, during the war for the Union; notably the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whose absence from the Chamber I regret. That distinguished Senator was more responsible than any other man now living for the deliberate and intentional creation of a depreciated currency at that time. The Government discredited its own currency by refusing to make it a legal tender for customs duties or for interest on the public debt. For the creation and enactment of this policy the Senator from Ohio and those who acted with him were bitterly denounced in my hearing on the floor of the House by the eloquent old Commoner, as he was styled, Thaddeus Stevens, the most effective leader of men I have ever seen in a parliamentary body.

Speaking of the currency act as it passed the Senate in February, 1862, the fiery and veteran leader of his party cried out in tones which I still well remember:

> Instead of being a beneficent and invigorating measure, it is now positively mischievous. It has all the bad qualities which its enemies charged on the original bill and none of its benefits. It now creates a money, and by its very terms declares it a depreciated currency. It makes two classes of money—one for the bankers and brokers, and another for the people. * * * The first purchase of gold by the Government will fix the value of these notes which we issue and declare to be a legal tender. The sale will fix their value at 10, 15, or 25 per cent discount, and then every poor man when he buys his beef, his pork, and his supplies, must submit to this 15 or 25 per cent discount because you have said that shall be the value of the very notes which you have made a legal tender to him but not a legal tender to those who fix the value of these very notes.

This strong appeal against the dishonor of American money went unheeded, however, at that time.

The deed of shame was accomplished; in the interest of cowardly, hoarded gold the greenback was sent forth crippled and maimed. It fell from one grade of discount to another, until its purchasing and debt-paying power was often but one-half that of gold or silver, and yet the Senator from Ohio and his party associates found nothing wrong in compelling the soldier to take this dishonored currency at par in full payment for his life on the field of battle. There was no hysterical cry then for sound money with which to pay the creditors of the Government who, in long lines of blue and under a four years' hail of lead and iron, saved the Government's existence. The financial legislation of the Senator from Ohio at that time enabled the owner of idle wealth to transmute the greenback at double its value into Government bonds to be paid in gold, while the soldier was forced to stand a discount of 50 cents on the dollar when he bought a barrel of flour or a suit of clothes or any other necessity for his family.

What an appropriate and striking stage setting for the play of "The Honest Dollar," with the Senator from Ohio in the title rôle, was made by the toil-worn, battle-scarred soldier when Republican legislation put him on half pay in front of the enemy, and reduced his pension money 50 per cent in value!

Such a play would have been a reality, pregnant with meaning and full of blessings a generation ago; it is a farce now. Every dollar now in existence is an honest dollar, and equal to every other dollar in the discharge of all the functions for which money was ever created.

This fact is known and appreciated by every Senator in the sound of my voice, and yet the bare suggestion that the Government should use honest silver money, sound silver money, full legal-tender silver money with which to pay the demands of gold gamblers, stock jobbers, and professional usurers from Wall street, New York, and Lombard street, London, will be met in certain quarters with ejaculations of pious horror and loud prayers in behalf of the public credit.

The dishonest features of financial legislation during the war for the Union did not entirely escape observation at the time. I recall with satisfaction, at least to myself, that at the proper time and in the proper place I made all the effort I could to protect the soldier then in the field from the oppressive evils of unsound money. It was true the Government could not pay the soldier in gold, but it is equally true that he could have been paid a sufficient amount of the depreciated currency he was then receiving to have kept the contract price of his enlistment and preserved the public honor. This I proposed to do, but the measure I introduced found a burial place without resurrection in the committee to which it was referred, while I was denounced as an unpatriotic member of a troublesome but helpless minority. The truth is there are hundreds of millions of dollars as honorably and equitably due to-day to the surviving soldiers of the Union Army under their contract of enlistment, and to the widows and children of those who are dead, as if the amount had been ascertained by a paymaster and the Government had issued its bonds for the same.

This just debt was repudiated long ago; it will never be paid, but at the same time it will never be forgotten. The Senator from Ohio in his recent speech on this floor arraigned the Democratic party for incompetency in the administration of the Government. Sir, I commend to his attention the record of his own party, wherein, under his leadership, it broke faith with the most meritorious creditors the Government ever had, paid them for their blood in paper that was purposely depreciated, while guaranteeing double profits in gold on every dollar invested in bonds or other public securities. When that Senator has looked into the records of parties a little more carefully, I hope we may hear from him again on the subject of sound money, and that he may not fail to give us the proper distinctions between sound money for the Wall street operator and the millionaire magnate on the one hand and sound money for the soldier and the citizen on the other. Let him show us, if he can, why it would impair and break down the public credit to pay the gold raiders of the Treasury in standard silver money, when in point of fact the American people, soldiers and citizens alike, during the war, and until 1878, a period of thirteen years after the war, received pay for everything and transacted all business in a depreciated circulating medium.

Sir, I am no advocate of a silver basis any more than a gold basis, nor would I favor the free coinage of silver if experience showed that such free coinage would disturb the parity between gold and silver money. I am in favor of no measure which will beget a single dollar of depreciated currency. By my voice and vote I stand pledged to maintain all our several kinds of currency at par with each other, and in strict uniformity in purchasing and debt-paying power. The accusation, however, against silver that its coinage would destroy the parity between the two metals has been proven to be false by every page of our country's history. The charge that it has ever driven gold out of the country, or that the fear of its coinage is doing so now, is equally false and unfounded.

When in 1878 the attempt was made to check the torrent of bankruptcy and ruin occasioned by the demonetization of silver in 1873, and the consequent contraction of currency which followed, there went up such a wail of dismal prophecy in these Halls over the proposed restoration of silver as will never be forgotten. An inspection now of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date is full of entertainment, and, indeed, of instruction. It will there be seen how able and learned men can grow eloquent in predicting what never comes to pass; how they can disregard the traditions and the Constitution of their fathers, as well as the teachings of all the ages known to human history.

Much indeed may be learned by recourse to the debates of seventeen years ago on this subject. I could occupy the time of the Senate hour after hour in reading the prophetic visions of dire disaster which then appeared to certain distinguished Senators if the Bland-Allison Act remonetizing silver, and providing for its partial coinage, should become a law. One of the first and most certain evils predicted was the hurried departure of gold from beneath the folds of the American flag; that it would take to itself wings and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth in order to escape the contamination of base, ignoble silver.

It is true the two metals had been for four thousand years the twins of the financial world, the gemini of nations, compeers and cofactors in the development, the advancement of the human race; but a new light seemed suddenly to burst upon certain minds to the effect that gold would no longer abide the companionship of its kindred metal, its old-time and long-tried ally. The alarming measure, however, was enacted into law, and the believing disciples of false prophets stood gaping in awful anticipation of coming ruin. What was it that did occur?

The Government proceeded in orderly and constitutional methods to coin $24,000,000 per annum of silver money for the use and benefit of the American people, and continued so to do for the next twelve years, making in all $288,000,000, and during this time the increase—not the decrease, but the increase—of gold in the United States was at the rate of about forty millions a year. At the date of the passage of the Bland-Allison Act the estimate of gold money in this country was $230,000,000, and when coinage ceased under that act it was more than three times that amount; over $700,000,000. And such was the fulfillment of the prophecies inspired by Pluto in 1878, and yet I am expected to believe now that the fair and legitimate coinage of silver, its free coinage upon a properly ascertained and determined ratio, will banish all our gold and put us on a single silver basis.

I must be pardoned for believing nothing of the kind. The shipments of gold which have taken place from this country in the last twelve months must be accounted for, to my mind, in a different way. They were a part of the same plan which has attempted to sack the Treasury of its gold reserve fund, to create distrust, fear, agitation, panic, and a withdrawal, as far as possible, of all money in circulation; and all this to be accompanied by a concerted outcry from terror-stricken business circles and from the whole national banking system that nothing can restore public confidence and save the public credit except the issuance of interest-bearing Government bonds in large amounts.

Sir, forty centuries of human history bear testimony that gold and silver in circulation as money have no natural hostility toward each other, and are never at a disparity unless made so by sinister and improper interests and legislation. When both metals were coined on an equality for more than three-quarters of a century in the United States, no friction or disturbance ever occurred between them, and all went well with the country. Since the demonetization of silver in 1873, we have been saluted with constant financial uproar and confusion, and bombarded by rapidly recurring panics. Earthquakes are frequent and familiar in certain quarters of the globe, owing to physical laws which prevail there; panics in the minds of men on monetary affairs have become a common and an almost every day affair in this country, owing to the bad legislation and attempted legislation of the last twenty-two years.

The attempt to put the business of this vast country, with its gigantic developments in progress everywhere, on a specie basis of gold alone signifies the most frightful contraction of money in circulation ever inflicted on any people beneath the sun. The contraction which followed the overthrow of silver in 1873 filled the country with wreck and calamity on all hands, and laid a train of evils throughout the whole land which have never been eradicated, and which from time to time still explode and shock and shatter the homes and the prosperity of the people. Contraction of the currency so that it will rest on one of the precious metals, instead of resting on both, means the destruction of one-half the money now in use, and to the laboring man it means one dollar where he now gets two for his work; to the farmer it means half price for what he has to sell; while to the money holder, the money lender, the money investor, it means a double power for his money in purchasing the labor and the property of all the productive classes.

The annulment of the silver dollar necessarily results in the shrinkage of the amount of paper in circulation one-half if the specie basis is to be maintained at all and that basis is to be gold alone. Who is ready to embrace such a consequence as this, of silver demonetization? The laboring and business people of this country can stand no more contraction of the currency; they have been compelled to stand too much already. Blood letting was once the cure in the medical profession for all ills of the human body; the doctors bled George Washington to death for a sore throat; and with equal sense and enlightenment financial quacks and empirics are now prescribing a depletion of the circulating medium, a contraction of the most deadly character, by withdrawing one-half the support which upholds our entire monetary system. Money, sound money, such as silver and gold, and paper resting upon them, is the life blood in the arteries of business, trade, commerce, and national progress, and can not be withdrawn without producing paralysis and death.

By far the greatest need now felt by the great mass of the American people is for an increase of currency on which to do business, for more money to stimulate trade and secure employment and good wages for labor. The volume of money in the hands of our people could reasonably be doubled this hour with indescribable advantages to all meritorious classes and without complaint from any except such as shave notes, buy up judgments on their neighbors, loan money on mortgaged homes, and speculate generally on the misfortunes of their fellow-beings. The human mind has never had conception of greater evils, more horrible miseries, than attend the scarcity of money, falling prices, impoverishment of labor, and the consequent enslavement of men and women by the swollen power of hoarded money in the hands of the few.

Slavery, stubborn, brutal slavery, can be no more effectually established than by doubling the value of debts and securities in the hands of creditors, and by diminishing at the same time and in the same proportion the means whereby debtors are enabled to meet their obligations and redeem themselves and their earnings from bondage. In the year 1816, at the close of the Napoleonic wars, when the laboring people, the taxpayers of Great Britain, found themselves owing a national debt of over four thousand millions of dollars to a comparatively few holders of her securities, Lord Liverpool secured the demonetization of silver, compressed the currency of his country to a gold basis, magnified the value of debts to those who collected them, and multiplied their pains and penalties to those who had them to pay.

In the year 1873, when the laboring people, the taxpayers of the United States, found themselves owing a national debt nearly as great as that of Great Britain to a class of wealth holders and wealth hoarders, who had stayed in the rear and speculated during the war for the Union, a similar movement was made in this country to that of Lord Liverpool in England, and for the same purpose and inspired by the same motives. To enrich creditors by the impoverishment and oppression of debtors was the object on both sides of the ocean. There was not a single commercial reason between the two nations on the subject. England had been on a so-called gold basis fifty-one years before the heavy indebtedness of the American people made it the interest of their creditors to strike down silver, contract the currency, and increase the power of the money that was left. No commercial difficulties had arisen because England was on a single standard of gold and the United States on a double standard of gold and silver.

This condition has lasted a half century, with great prosperity to the two countries, and without a whimper or word of complaint from either in regard to rates of exchange, balances of trade, or anything of that kind. Greedy eyes and avaricious hearts were watching, however, from this side of the Atlantic, and rejoiced in the opportunity presented by an enormous national debt to follow the lead of the aristocracy of England. And now we are told from day to day and from hour to hour that we must imbibe the financial policy of England and conform to her dictation or lose our credit with the nations of the earth. We are incessantly reminded and solemnly warned that we can not maintain the double standard and preserve the parity between gold and silver unless England joins us in an agreement to that effect and lends us the favor of her countenance and assistance.

Sir, I am aware that in certain matters belonging to frivolous society and mercantile matrimony in this country there exists a harmless and very useless class of Anglomaniacs, but the great body of the American people believe intensely in their individual and national independence, and have great self-respect in remembering how, and from whom, and at what cost that independence was won. The Empire of Great Britain can set no example, dictate no fashion, inspire no policy which any patriotic portion of our citizens will feel called upon to follow unless in strict accord with their own interests. The credit of this Government is a creation of its own, resting on its own resources and its own honor. Nor was it ever stronger or firmer in all the four quarters of the world than it is now. It has not shaken nor quivered for a moment, or fallen the breadth of a hair in any market or money center on the face of the earth, notwithstanding the incessant tirade which for several years past has assailed it because silver was one of its elements.

It is within my knowledge upon the most reliable authority that during the past summer Treasury notes of the United States, greenbacks, and silver certificates were received without question or hesitation in trade and in exchange transactions in England, Germany, and France, and in other parts of Europe. Silver money is not a fly in the ointment of our national credit, and has not tainted or impaired it in the least.

Sir, in discussing the policy of this Government on the subject of silver, and the competency and incompetency of parties and persons as manifested in legislation, the celebrated and very ill-omened Sherman Act arises to our view at every step. I speak with habitual respect of the Senator from Ohio, but never before in the history of the world did a member of a parliamentary body find himself compelled to turn, as he did, on his own offspring and assist in putting it to death. It stood openly confessed as an unnatural monster by the very author of its being. It was neither a friend to silver nor to any other form of sound money, and did not even pretend to be. It was a disturber of the financial peace of the country and a standing menace to permanent business prosperity.

I do not cite this act now, however, for the purpose of dwelling upon it at any length, nor to hold it up as an evidence of the wisdom or the unwisdom, the competency or the incompetency, of the Senator from Ohio, or of his superior qualifications to sit as a censor on the mental capacity of other people in matters of financial legislation. I allude to this most discreditable act in our legislative history for the purpose of showing the clear, explicit, and unequivocal position which this Government assumed in regard to the coinage and use of gold and silver both, as standard money, only a little more than two years ago. The act repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act is composed of only three sentences, and two of them read as follows:

> And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

How like the bugle notes of the Constitution and the laws as enacted and interpreted by the fathers of the Republic these utterances salute our ears! The policy here declared received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, and was approved by the Executive on the 1st day of November, 1893. There it stands, and there it will stand forever. The doctrines therein contained have been indorsed and upheld by all the great names in American history from George Washington to Abraham Lincoln. Illustrious leaders of parties have differed on all things else; but on the one great cardinal question of the coinage and use of both the precious metals as standard money no differences have ever existed until since the creation of a vast national debt and the hungry, insatiate demands of a powerful creditor class. Jackson, and Clay, and Adams, and Crawford were all in the field as rivals for the Presidency in 1824, and antagonized each other on every other issue except the greatest of them all—the bimetallic specie basis for all our currency.

On this question no sound of disagreement was heard between them. General Harrison, with the battlefields of Tippecanoe and the Thames behind him, defeated Martin Van Buren in 1840 on a cry of hard times and disordered finances, but there was no note of discord between parties then as to the soundness or unsoundness of either silver or gold. Lincoln and Douglas in their well-known contests debated almost every proposition that could arise under our Constitution, but they never found any disagreement on the subject of the two metals. Webster and Calhoun strained the very existence of the Government itself by their discussions in this body, but they stood united at every step in support of the policy of the United States to continue the coinage and use of both gold and silver as standard money. The giants of other days were all one way on this question, irrespective of party politics, just as the people, the great body of the laboring and business masses, are today, if a fair and direct chance were given them to settle it. Not a single citizen of the United States, of any party, creed, or persuasion, can ever be benefited by the banishment of silver, its degradation and destruction, unless he is the owner and holder of idle money which he desires to invest in cheap labor or property at half its value, or loan at usurious rates of interest.

Sir, there is one other point in the record of parties on this subject which I can not pass over in silence. In the great and successful campaign of 1892 the Democratic party went before the country on a plain and explicit platform of principles. The Chicago convention which nominated the present very able and patriotic Executive, and the American people who supported and elected him, stood on the following declaration of perfect faith in both the precious metals:

> We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal, or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage for both metals must be of equal intrinsic or exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin. We insist upon this policy as especially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseless victims of unstable money and a fluctuating currency.

Who, sir, on this side of the Chamber dissents now from this great landmark of financial truth? I know of no one. From the days of my youth I have marched, and camped, and fought with the Democratic party, and I expect to do so to the end. I found no difficulty in standing on the national platform of my party in 1892, and find none now. We need go no further for harmony, union, and strength than its readoption in 1896. It is broad and explicit enough to insure the coinage and use of both metals as standard money, and on equal terms, while every possible guaranty is given for their parity and for their equal power in the payment of debts. The spirit of concession and compromise also presides over every relation of society and every function of government. It was present every moment during the construction of the Constitution, and has guided the wisest counsels of parties and of the Government ever since. I invoke its benignant presence at this time whenever discord prevails.

As to my own position on the question now before the Senate, I have said nothing to-day that I have not said heretofore.

I am now in the nineteenth year of my service in this body. The leading issue on which I was first chosen to the Senate by the people of Indiana was the repeal of the act of 1873 and the restoration of the free coinage of silver. A popular majority of more than 30,000 was given to the members of the legislature who supported that issue and gave me their votes. Nor has there been any change of position or expression on that question by the party to which I belong in the State which has honored me so many years. My record here on the subject of silver is very familiar to the people I represent, and by them it has never been rebuked. I simply here and now reassert it, and further declare that not for all the honors this Government or this world has to bestow would I be responsible for the ruin and suffering I foresee in the further destruction and contraction of debt-paying money in the hands of the American people.

Whether any one man remains in public life or goes into peaceful retirement matters little to the world, and perhaps less to himself, but all the gold and silver of the earth put together can not compensate him for violating his deep-seated convictions of duty and debauching his never-dying conscience. Without reproach toward others or impeachment of anyone, I shall go forward in behalf of the right as it has been given me to see the right. A great historic character, when environed by perils, once exclaimed:

Unless I be convinced, I neither can nor dare retract anything, for my conscience is a captive to God's word, and it is neither safe nor right to go against conscience. There I take my stand. I can do no otherwise.

Deeply important, however, as the question now under discussion is to the American people, yet no one issue has ever constituted the life, nor will it ever cause the death, of any one of the great political parties of the country. The Democratic party has lived for and through all the issues of the past, and it grapples now with every question which affects the present welfare of the people. To abolish tariff taxation for protection; to preserve the sovereignty of home rule in the States; to guarantee free elections without threat or menace from force bills; to secure the people everywhere from the invasive, domiciliary, and sumptuary legislation of centralized power, whether exercised by the Federal or by State governments; to establish and maintain a foreign policy of strength, and fearless, prompt response toward the strong and the arrogant; of forbearance and charity toward the weak, and of justice and honor toward all; these great and vital policies and purposes of government, and others akin to them, have no sure and safe support outside of the party founded by Thomas Jefferson. They are imbued with immortal life, and the Democratic party will live and triumph as their custodian and guardian as long as free government survives on this continent.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the measure which came from the House providing for an issue of 3 per cent bonds to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to supply a deficit in the gold redemption fund necessary to preserve the parity of the two metals, silver and gold, is by no means all that the situation demands. It ought to seem absurd to the common sense of every man that a bond issued by the Government specifically to obtain gold, for which gold is demanded, should not be allowed to promise gold in return, especially when it is known that the interest charge to the Government would be lessened thereby.

But inasmuch as there is a slight advantage in the form and terms of the bond proposed by the House bill over those of the bond issued under the provisions of the law now in force, I am willing to vote for it. But I would vote for it not because, as is sometimes said on this floor, I consider a bond issue a panacea for all ills, and desirable in itself, or that I do not deprecate the conditions which make it necessary, but because the duty imposed upon the Administration by law can not, in my opinion, otherwise be performed, and because I desire to see the silver currency of the country kept exchangeable with the gold currency and the equal purchasing power of both preserved.

That the financial situation of the Treasury is anomalous and deplorable all seem ready to admit. No other country in the civilized world has so encumbered its fiscal affairs or voluntarily imposed such burdens upon its exchequer. To make bricks without straw was the edict of a cruel taskmaster; but that intelligent representatives of an intelligent people should insist upon exacting from their own Government the task of maintaining a pile of gold in its Treasury which the whole world is invited to draw from by demand notes furnished by itself in compelled perpetual succession, with no possible source of gold income, passes my understanding.

This task no government is equipped to perform, and that financial disaster and distress should follow the attempt is not surprising.

That an unnatural necessity for bond issues exists flows from the unnatural conditions which the legislation of the country has created and permits to continue.

Mr. President, why not pay and permanently retire the demand notes of the United States? Why not relieve your Treasury from this Sisyphean labor? Why longer demand from your governmental agents the tale of bricks without furnishing the straw? What benefits are to be derived from continuing the present condition of financial chaos? Every business interest of the country is in suspense waiting for the outcome of our deliberations. A nascent prosperity has been checked because the future is made uncertain. Long-time contracts are curtailed because none can tell what shall be the measure of their performance. The wings of commerce are clipped by this uncertainty, and the courage of capital for new enterprises is destroyed. Reasonable certainty as to the future is the vital breath of prosperity.

Mr. President, let us, if we can, restore and confine the Treasury of this great country to its natural function of honestly collecting the revenues provided by law and honestly disbursing them pursuant to our appropriations. Divorce the Government from the banking business, which it is not equipped to perform. Provide a measure of value the most stable the civilized world can command, and a currency of both gold and silver, circulating side by side with equal exchangeable value and purchasing power. Leave to the commercial activities and intelligence of the country the furnishing of a credit currency wherewith to supplement the gold and silver, and the creation and healthy operation of these credit devices by which in modern times to an increasing extent the great mass of exchanges are effected. Take away from the business of the country as far as possible the interfering hand of Government, and relegate it to its proper function of keeping the peace while a free people work out their own material salvation, of regulating the conduct of its citizens, and seeing that the exercise of the individual freedom of the citizen shall not infringe on the equal freedom of all others. Leave ungrudgingly to the local self-government of the States all governmental powers not surrendered to the National Government, and keep unimpaired our confidence in the capacity of the people of each to wisely exercise them. These principles lie at the foundation of my political faith, and by them I endeavor to govern my political conduct.

But, Mr. President, to return from these general reflections to the precise question before the Senate. The Committee on Finance has seen fit to return the House bill for the issue of a 3 per cent coin bond, with such small measure of relief as it promised, without its approval, and to recommend as a substitute a bill providing for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. This raises the question, so often presented of late years, whether the United States can alone, without the cooperation of the principal countries of the civilized world, adopt the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and at the same time maintain the parity now existing between gold and silver coin. I know that there is little or nothing new to be said on this question, but inasmuch as the same old arguments in advocacy of free coinage are being repeated, it is necessary to again point out their fallacy. I do not suppose that there are any who contend that the parity now happily existing could be maintained unless, by reason of free coinage or for some other reason, the bullion value of silver should be brought to a parity with that of gold at the ratio of 16 to 1.

I know that it is frequently asserted that such a result would follow free coinage. It has been asserted this afternoon by the eloquent Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who tells us that he would not advocate the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 unless he believed that the enactment of such a law would at once produce a parity between the two metals. In that, I am sorry to say, he differs from some of his fellow-advocates of free coinage. It has been asserted that although value can not be created by act of Congress, a change of the coinage laws by creating an increased demand would enhance the value of silver. That this might be so to some slight extent and for a short time is possible. But the exploiters of this assertion stop short with the suggestion. They not only fail entirely to prove that any increased demand that might result from free coinage by the United States alone would fill the gap now existing in the bullion value of the two metals; they do not even produce an argument in favor of the proposition that there would be an increased demand after the first excitement of the change. We have now silver bullion and silver dollars piled up in the Treasury vaults which is not demanded for circulation. All attempts to force a larger circulation of silver have proved abortive. The fact is that we to-day have a redundant circulating medium—gold, silver, greenbacks, Treasury notes, and bank notes, all interchangeable and of equal purchasing power—aggregating somewhere near $1,500,000,000 or $1,600,000,000. I have not the exact figures.

If gold were not displaced by silver there would be no increased demand for silver. And if gold should be so displaced it would be so by reason of the fact that the bullion value of the silver dollar was less than that of the gold dollar. The fact is that the relative demand for silver for all purposes has fallen off in the face of a constantly increasing supply. If, indeed, there should be a parity restored between gold and silver bullion at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the free coinage of silver by the United States, then it would seem that the great benefits to result from higher prices and the payment of debts in cheaper money, so dwelt upon by 16 to 1 advocates, would fail of realization. For no one, I suppose, is so fond as to imagine that gold would be materially displaced the world over by the adoption of free coinage in the United States. No; if silver and gold are to be brought to a parity in this way it must be by an appreciation of silver, which nothing short of the union of all the great nations of the world in free coinage of silver at or near the ratio of 16 to 1 can accomplish. Whether this even could succeed without an effort and a sacrifice, for which the end achieved would not compensate, is doubtful.

Gold is the money metal preferred by the advanced and enterprising nations of the world. As a standard it serves the needs of commerce and trade better than silver, and its increasing production, together with the smaller use of actual money required for the exchanges of the world, render it adequate in quantity for a stable standard. A double standard has never existed in fact. The attempt to create one has resulted in an alternate single standard of either one metal or the other, and that has been discarded as undesirable by the great mass of the civilized world. Gold would be the standard measure of value in all the great marts of the world without any compelling law or regulating statute. Nothing but arbitrary power could establish the so-called double standard in the way desired by the advocates of free coinage at 16 to 1. The great current of human activity in commerce and trade and intellectual enterprise can be obstructed and impeded by legislation, but it can not be created, turned back, or controlled by men, legislative whim, or fiat. The desires and practice of the larger number of civilized and commercial nations is in the line of gold as a standard and as large a use of silver in circulation as is consistent with the preservation of the standard. With silver as a standard, gold disappears from circulation as well as a standard of value, unless silver is brought up to the parity of gold in its bullion and commercial value; while with gold as a standard a large and increasing concurrent circulation of both gold and silver is and can continue to be maintained.

But, Mr. President, I do not know that the belief longer remains to any great extent that free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 will bring about a parity of the two metals. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], in the able and interesting speech which he made the other day, if he does not admit his own want of belief in the possibility of such a legislative feat, at least views with equanimity the possible result of the 16-to-1 policy proposed by the committee amendment, and declares that he prefers to see gold at a premium and used as a commodity and silver as a standard to the present conditions. I have no doubt that in so declaring he fairly represents the greater number of silver advocates.

How is such a policy to be commended to the people? I listened with great attention, as I always do, to the Senator from Arkansas, who reports this amendment from the Finance Committee, to learn from him how it was that the people of this country were to be persuaded that a free-coinage measure for silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was to be for their interests and for the increase of their happiness and prosperity. I found no proposition upon which that persuasion was rested, except one, and that seems to be the underlying proposition of all the arguments which have been presented to the Senate, and, so far as I know, to the people of this country, that were worthy of attention, and that is that in some way or other the so-called demonetization of silver in 1873 by the United States, and within a few years by Germany and France, had worked an appreciation of the gold standard, and had thereby brought about a decline in the prices of commodities and the productions of labor. That, unless I entirely misapprehend the scope and trend of the argument in that behalf, is the foundation stone upon which is erected the whole superstructure of the advocacy of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. The decline in prices is, in the first place, declared to be a detriment and a misfortune to the country, and, in the second place, it is asserted that this decline has been brought about by the appreciation of gold since about 1873.

Mr. President, so important are these propositions that they deserve careful consideration, and such examination I shall attempt to give them now.

If prices have not declined by reason of the so-called demonetization of silver, and if, on the other hand, the decline of prices which has admittedly taken place is not a curse but a blessing to the masses of the people of this country, then it seems to me that, the foundation being destroyed, the whole superstructure of the argument falls to the ground.

What evidence has been adduced by a single advocate of this free-coinage measure to show that prices have declined because of the so-called demonetization of silver, and that gold has appreciated, which is the correlative of the decline of prices in gold? None that I have been able to discover, except that the price of silver itself has declined nearly pari passu with that of the staple commodities with which it is compared. If there is no other refuge for the argument of those who advocate this amendment than the bare fact that silver has declined in price as measured by gold, and that the commodities produced by agricultural and other industries have also declined, then I say that there has been a failure to prove the assertion; nay, there has been a failure to prove even the probability that the one is the cause of the other.

On the other hand, I think it can be shown to every candid and fair mind that the decline in price of every staple commodity that has been mentioned in the course of this argument can be accounted for by reasons that are obvious and on the surface, and that have no relation to the decline of silver and do not even suggest an appreciation of the standard of value. And when we show that silver itself has been subjected to the influence of the great price-controlling element that always is so potent, that of increased supply and diminishing demand, then I think we can safely assert that the corner stone of this argument has been destroyed.

Mr. President, the argument that declining prices are due to any condition of things produced by the law of 1873, or the demonetization of silver in Germany, or the cessation of free coinage in France leaves out of sight altogether those great economic influences which are always at work and operating and which can be discovered by the most casual observation. It leaves out of sight all the great improvements which have been made in industrial production. I know that the Senator from Arkansas, with that fairness which is characteristic of him, will admit that a decline in prices not caused by appreciating money, but which not be traced to improved methods and modes of production, is not an undesirable thing, but I want to call his attention, and the attention of the Senate, to the fact that stares us in the face, that meets us at every turn, that the last twenty-five years have been marked by an improvement and an advance in methods of production unequaled in all the past history of the world.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. One moment, if you please. I will yield in a moment.

That argument loses sight of all those great appliances for the transaction of business, the improvements and increase in railroad transportation, steamship navigation, the telegraph, the telephone, and of the numberless devices for dispensing with the use of actual money in making the exchanges of the world.

Mr. President, who, if his attention is called to it in the most casual way, does not recognize that in twenty-five years there has been almost as great a revolution in the transportation facilities of this country as there was when railroads first superseded the old transportation by stage coach? The continent has been spanned; thousands of miles of railroads have penetrated into regions that hitherto were unproductive because remote from the markets of the world; hundreds of thousands of acres of land have been brought into tillage. Increased production of the great food products of the world has been the consequence. Are these to be lost sight of and ignored, and this great and beneficent decline of prices of the great necessities of life to be attributed to a demonetization in 1873, which was not discovered until two or three years after it had been consummated? No, no, Mr. President, we can not close our eyes to the history that is making around us, to the facts that stare us in the face. I hardly need to particularize.

But let me call the attention of the Senate to a conspicuous instance of this great price-reducing movement that mechanical improvement and invention and brain power have brought about. I allude to the Bessemer steel process. This has occurred within the period which we are discussing. Prior to that invention and the expiration of the patent of the Bessemer-Siemens process for converting iron into steel, steel rails sold for $187 per ton. To-day $25 a ton is the price of the best steel rails. Has that had nothing to do with the cost of railroad building? Has that had nothing to do with that most important factor in the distribution of the products of labor; I mean the cheapness and increased facility of transportation? To-day we convert 20 tons of iron into steel rails in twenty-three minutes. Iron rails are worth about $22 a ton, and steel rails last three times as long as iron rails.

Think of the enormous economy in the one factor of transportation, which enters into the price to-day of every article of common use and common necessity. At the commencement of this period, or a little before, corn was burned as it was taken from the fields over the Western prairies. To-day it is sold for only a little, 6 or 7 cents, less than it is sold on the coast line of the country and at the port of New York.

Mr. ALLEN. It is being burned to-day.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, if that state of things has been brought about by opening up the markets by this cheap transportation to the production of the grain of the great prairies of the West, until they are competing with the farmers of the Atlantic Coast, so that the farmers here are suffering, as they say, and say truthfully, from the competition of those great steam-plowed fields of the West, and has brought your product to the seaboard for exportation in such quantities, and has so increased the production that, as the Senator from Nebraska says, they are burning it again to-day, what has that to do, I ask the Senator from Nebraska, with the price of silver, when I show him, as he must admit, that there are causes adequate to produce this result, and which he knows exist?

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to answer him?

Mr. GRAY. No, not to answer me now.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I shall take occasion to do so after the Senator concludes his remarks.

Mr. GRAY. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. President, that is one conspicuous example of what invention and improvement and enterprise have done for the cheapening of those staple commodities the consumption of which enter into our daily life and are necessary for the happiness and well-being of the people. Do you want to increase those prices by arbitrary legislation? Dare you go to the teeming populations of your seaboard and the central West, to the toiling millions who buy those products, and tell them that this legislation is meant to make dearer the bread with which they feed themselves and their little ones?

I want to see the silver dollar preserved at its present purchasing power. I want to see it, when translated in the hands of the workingman into clothes and food and shelter, to mean the largest possible amount of all those things; and that is why I feel constrained to oppose the proposition that by cheapening money you are to raise prices without any promise that the wage of labor is to be raised at the same time and by the same measure.

Mr. President, not alone by railroad transportation is the production of food at the command of every part of the world. Steamships made of steel and of enormous and increasing carrying capacity are making common highways of the deep. The grain of America is carried in six to ten days to the markets where you supply the hungry mouths that wait for it and the teeming millions that stand ready to buy it in the Old World. But at the same time, in competition with this grain and food producing power of America, the steamship and the railroad have not been idle in other parts of the world. Russia has been and is being every day more opened up as a source of supply. The cotton fields of Egypt and of India come into competition with the cotton of America. How are you going to remedy that state of things by legislation here in the United States? How, by any such puny measure as this, can you expect to thwart and interfere with and turn back a state of progress like this, produced by causes so powerful as those I have described?

I do not deny that the prices of agricultural products are low, but I have attempted to show—and if I have not, it will be plain, upon the mere suggestion, to every thoughtful mind—that the true cause of the cheapening of agricultural products has not been the act of 1873 or the ceasing of coinage by France or the demonetization of silver by Germany, but it has been because of cheaper and increased production—production that has run ahead of demand, and which has operated, as it always will operate, to influence price and bring down the cost to those who consume.

If this be so, then the Senator from Arkansas, who has already, with the candor I have described, admitted that such a decline of price is not to be objected to, must either reform his argument or in sheer benevolence to the mass of the people whose living he would make a little harder and whose struggle for existence would be made a little more severe vote against the measure he has advocated.

Mr. President, not only have we steamship lines with increasing carrying capacity over the old sailing ships, but the improvements in the steam engine every year have been giving more and more carrying capacity to the hull, and there has been such economy in the use of coal over the old lever engine, in the triple and quadruple expansion of steam, that its consumption has been reduced to something like one-fourth or one-fifth of what it was formerly. The possibility of larger freight space, the greater celerity with which voyages are made, one iron ship of 10,000 tons, with its precious burden, making eight trips where an old sailing ship could only make one—is that to have no effect upon prices? No famine can exist now in any spot upon the earth's surface. Thank God for the beneficence of these civilizing influences of modern inventions and modern enterprise, the whole world is drawn upon, and when there is a scarcity of grain in Russia, as there was a year or two ago, the ships of this country speed across the Atlantic with the surplus product of this country, bought or contributed by warm hearts that are always ready to respond to the cry of distress, no matter how far away it may be sounded. What a contrast is this!

Within the memory of men now living, within the memory of the Senator from Arkansas and myself, the scarcity in one country might destroy thousands of lives because the local food supply had run short. In Ireland in 1848, and in India twenty or thirty years thereafter, famines have almost decimated population. What has made it now, as I have said, an almost impossible thing that that should occur, except these wonderful improvements in the products of the enterprise and the brain and the courage and the capital of the civilized world?

Mr. President, that is not all. The methods of transacting business, the mode in which exchanges are made of commodity for commodity, have all been so wonderfully facilitated by modern methods of business and by modern appliances that there can be no comparison between the new and the old. Within our memory if a cargo of jute or of gunny bags was to be brought from India you had to send the gold across the sea on a two or three months' voyage, with the loss of interest, the risk of destruction of the gold itself, and then the long wait for the return. Now, as I have had occasion to say—I think it was the Senator from Massachusetts who told me a year or two ago—a gentleman in Boston before he left for the train ordered a cargo such as I have mentioned at Bombay, and immediately took the train. When he arrived in Washington there was sent to him a cablegram from his house in Boston that the cargo had been bought, the ship chartered, and commenced loading, and the credit to pay for it transferred, and not one dollar of gold budged from the position that it had occupied hitherto. Is all that, the result of this tremendous improvement and advancement in the methods by which business is transacted, to be lost sight of? Is all that to be ignored as not counting in the decline of prices? Oh, no, Mr. President; causes so obvious as these can not be whistled down the wind; they can not fail to challenge attention. They are sufficient to account for the result, and there is no other sufficient cause which has been, so far as I know, suggested.

I have some notes here, very interesting to me, and I think they would be to the Senate if I had more time, illustrating the mighty truth that the invention and ingenuity of man is working all the time for the betterment of his condition; and that it is only when the process is interfered with, interfered with by arbitrary legislation or thwarted by arbitrary power, that these benign processes do not go on with increasing celerity for the blessing of the world and of mankind.

I have here before me—taking it up at random—this one matter cognate to the one I have been discussing in a general way—the improvement in railroads and in transportation, the matter of freight.

In 1867, at the beginning of the year, the rates of freight by rail from New York City to Chicago for dry goods were from $1.88 to $2.02—the lowest to the highest—for a hundred pounds; for coffee, in bags, $1.70 per 100 pounds, and so on. In 1892, twenty-five years later, dry goods were carried by rail to Chicago from New York for 75 cents for 100 pounds; coffee for 35 cents, and so on. A reduction from $1.27 to $1.13 on the 100 pounds on dry goods is sufficient to cause a reduction of the prices of the goods themselves.

I have here also some memoranda of the actual difference in freight from Chicago to New York for grain. It is interesting to note that in 1845, to go back that far, spring wheat in Chicago was selling for 52 cents per bushel.

Mr. HOAR. At what time?

Mr. GRAY. Fifty years ago. That would be 1845. In New York, the same year, the same quality of spring wheat sold for 90 cents a bushel in October, and in July of that year at $1.05 a bushel—the difference in the cost of transportation, of course, from Chicago to New York. From the official returns of the New York Produce Exchange as to freights, which commenced in the year 1868, we have this: From Chicago to New York, in 1868, the freight in that year by rail was 42.6 cents per bushel; by rail and lake 29 cents a bushel; by lake and canal, all by water, 22.8 cents per bushel. In 1895 the same quality of spring wheat as in 1845 was 65 cents per bushel in New York and 56 cents per bushel in Chicago, the freight from Chicago by lake and rail being 6½ cents per bushel.

Now, Mr. President, there is another thing to be considered. The same causes which produced the decline in the price of commodities that I have mentioned, and many others, of wheat, cotton, iron, dry goods, have operated also in regard to silver, whose decline is so much deplored. Increased production in the face of a yielding demand must have its effect upon that product as well as upon any other.

In 1855 the coin value of silver, the product of the world, was, if I am not mistaken, something like $40,000,000, and that of gold about $130,000,000. I am speaking from memory and would be glad to be corrected if I am wrong. That is where gold was at that time. The annual gold product of the world of that day was about three times that of silver. In 1895 the Secretary of the Treasury puts the gold product of the world at about $180,000,000, I think, speaking in round numbers, and the silver product at about $157,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. More than that.

Mr. GRAY. I would be glad to have the figures if the Senator from Colorado has them.

Mr. TELLER. I say more than $157,000,000.

Mr. GRAY. More than $157,000,000 as against $180,000,000. While there has been this enormous increase in the world's product of gold (which I shall allude to directly as one of the reasons why gold is performing sufficiently the money function of the world) there has been this relative increase in the product of silver—whereas in 1855 the silver product was about one-third that of gold, in 1895 the silver product is nearly equal to that of gold.

Mr. ALLEN. Has there not been a corresponding increased use among the people?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, Mr. President; in one sense there has been a corresponding increase and in another, as civilization and the facility for exchanges have advanced, there has been a relative decreased use of the precious metals as a medium of exchange, and I will come to that presently.

With decreased necessity for the actual presence of the money metals has come an increase in the volume of gold, which, on many accounts that I need not here pause to enumerate, has become the preferred metal among all the commercial and enterprising countries of the globe.

The recent chemical treatment of gold ores has largely increased the product of gold, and poor ores heretofore not rich enough in gold to be worked are now yielding a profit, which, as the processes improve, must open up new fields of gold production and materially increase the supply of gold.

With an increasing supply of gold, the increasing transactions of the world have found themselves accommodated, because year by year there is less and less necessity for counting down the broad gold pieces in order to effect an exchange of commodities, and that is all that trade is at last. The man who makes a coat for sale does not want the gold to keep. He wants to turn it into trade, or into shoes, or hats, or something that will be of use; and that barter and that exchange is facilitated and brought about by the use of money; but every contrivance, every facility by which these great exchanges in large amounts are carried on without the use of metal money is just that much of an unloading of the exchange burden from the function of the money in use.

Mr. President, it is an old story, but by the devices of the clearing houses in the great money centers like New York, Chicago, New Orleans, Baltimore, and Philadelphia every day these exchanges are consummated by the payment of real money of the smallest possible amount—I mean small relatively to the amount of the exchanges themselves. I do not pause now to look for figures; I have them here. I take the amount of one year's transactions in the clearing house in New York. It was thirty-four thousand million dollars, and that was effected by the use of about one thousand million dollars of real money. Nobody wants to wipe out all that. Nobody wants to go back to those mediæval and primitive and less civilized times when you carried all your wealth about you in a leathern girdle and counted down the gold or silver pieces for every transaction you made. Not at all. You give a check for the horse you buy. You give a check for your bill at the grocer's. You buy a farm and you do not see a dollar of money, but a transfer of the credit on some solvent banker's book will effect the exchange.

Mr. ALLEN. There would have to be money to get the check, would there not?

Mr. GRAY. Yes; there will have to be money to pay the check if you go there and demand it; but if you know you could get it you do not want it; and the check is taken to the clearing house and is set off against some other check, and so it goes until at last the result is reached that I have just illustrated by the figures of the New York clearing house; and an infinitesimal sum of money relatively will square up that and hundreds of other similar transactions.

Mr. President, I am not arguing that money is not needed and increasingly needed as civilization advances, but step by step with these advances come these processes, which you can not keep men from resorting to. They are the outgrowth of our times. They are the invention of the ingenuity and the brains of the active people who have made the civilization of the world. They are processes which you may retard, but you can not control and can not turn back any more than you can turn back the Gulf Stream that has flowed in all time on its destined course.

No, no; do not let us deceive ourselves about what we can do and what we can not do by legislation. Do not let us shut our eyes to obvious facts and conditions which enter into the discussion and consideration of the situation with which we are now dealing.

Cotton has declined in price and so has silver, and cotton has gone up in price and silver has gone down. Some commodities have declined enormously whilst others have remained stationary. How are you going to account for it by the decline in the value of silver? Wheat has gone down and so has cotton, but meat products have gone up. Pork per barrel is higher now than it was at the period years back when silver was subjected to its so-called demonetization. Cattle have gone up and gone down in price, while silver has gone steadily down. All have been affected by causes that were ascertainable and that influenced the movement, and could in no way, so far as I can discover, be referred to the depreciation of silver bullion.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware a question in this connection, which perhaps he would have answered himself without my asking him before he got through. Is it not true that in spite of the enormous increase of the labor-saving machinery and mechanism which compete with and take the place of human labor that human labor itself has increased and not diminished in price the world over in that period?

Mr. GRAY. I was just coming to that. The Senator is right in thinking that I would touch on that matter.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I thought it a very important view and should receive attention in this connection.

Mr. GRAY. Not at all; I was willing to hear the suggestion.

Now, Mr. President, if we take the prices of cotton and silver, if we are to rely implicitly as an article of our monetary faith upon this nexus between the decline of silver and the decline of commodities, how does it happen that in 1886 silver was worth 99.4 cents an ounce and cotton was worth 9.44 cents a pound, and that January 2, 1896, silver was worth 67 cents and cotton was worth 8.10 cents? If the depreciation of silver bullion is the cause, as is asserted in this Chamber, of the decline in this and other great staples, how do you account for those fluctuations? Why should not the same causes always produce the same effect? If they do not, then the burden rests upon the advocates of this theory to show that exceptional causes have taken such instances as I have named out of the general rule.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas in the speech to which I have referred said, and said truly, that after all the great measure of value is labor. It is very hard to get a standard for a standard. To measure gold by itself is impossible. I agree with him, and I think that most thoughtful men will agree with him, that there is no better criterion of value than human labor. I would ask him and ask Senators who do me the honor of giving me their attention to go with me over some of the statistics that are within the reach of all of us, made by competent hands, I presume, made under the authority of the Senate, and see whether it be true that, in applying this test of human labor, gold has appreciated, or whether the evidence would not be the other way.

There was an investigation made under the supervision of a very expert and experienced statistician—one as competent as anyone I know of in this country, Mr. Carroll D. Wright—in regard to prices generally and the wages of labor in this country through long periods. The results that were published in a document presented to the Senate by the Committee on Finance two or three years ago show some very interesting things in regard to the topic that I am now discussing. We find here a comparison of wages every tenth year from 1840, except 1870, when wages were abnormally high on account of an inflated paper currency, all reduced to the gold standard, and here is the result:

In the building trades, a most important department of human industry, we find, taking 1840, that plasterers got $1.50 in gold a day; in 1850, $1.75 per day in gold; in 1860, $1.75; in 1880, $2, and in 1890, $3.50.

I will not detain the Senate by going through the fifteen or twenty different occupations—carpenters, farmers, laborers, painters, blacksmiths, and so on; but taking the blacksmiths, we find that they got $1.50 in 1840; $1.50 in 1860; $3 in 1880, and $3 in 1890. The table will speak for itself when printed:

Occupations (per diem).	1840.	1850.	1860.	1880.	1890.

Commenting upon this result, the committee says:

The advance in daily wages which has been here noted has been accompanied by a decrease in the hours of labor. Compared with 1840, hourly wages in 1891 stood at 209, and compared with 1860, at 176.8.

I pause to ask, when this test has been applied to it, what has become of the assertion that gold has appreciated and that declining prices are due to that appreciation. I have shown, I think, conclusively that there were causes adequate to explain the decline in great staple commodities of production and industry, the things that go to make up the necessities of life; and if at the same time I show that measured by this test wages have advanced, what are we to say about the condition of the country that is so deplorable, and about which so much is said here day after day in order to show the absolute necessity of revolutionizing our standard of values and throwing into confusion all the business enterprises of the land? If the laborer gets more in gold than he did twenty or thirty or forty years ago and can buy more per dollar with it, I should like to know who is hurt and why you want to change it.

Oh, say the Senator from Arkansas and others, we want to cheapen the dollar in order that we may stay this decline in prices; that we may restore prices. For whose benefit? I grant you that there has been a decline in agricultural products, but the causes of that decline, I repeat, lie outside of the domain of this discussion as to the demonetization of silver and the appreciation of gold. And if they do, I should like to know on what principle of justice and humanity you are to go to the millions and millions of wage earners in this country, on the farm, in the factory, on the railroad, and in the mine, and tell them that you are by arbitrary fiat of law going to increase the price of the things that they must buy, thereby decreasing the purchasing power of their wages.

Mr. PEFFER. Before the Senator from Delaware leaves that particular part of his subject, I should like to ask him whether in his estimate he takes into account that the efficiency of labor has increased more rapidly than the wages of labor have increased?

Mr. GRAY. I have not lost sight of that. I am aware of it; but I do not think it is pertinent to the line of thought that I am now endeavoring to pursue. With every increase in the efficiency of labor there comes an increase in the wages of labor itself, perhaps not adequate or commensurate with the efficiency, but still an increase. Now, we are told that it is a thing to be desired, that it is a thing to be accomplished by legislation—that the purchasing power of a dollar shall be decreased by raising the prices of commodities. As I have already said, I want the dollar that is earned by the sweat of a man's brow to mean all it does mean and more, too, if possible, of the comforts, necessities, or it may be the luxuries of life. He is entitled to them. He has earned them. It is what he works for, and I shall never by my vote, if I understand it, endeavor to take it away from him.

Mr. President, in order to cheapen the dollar that you say you give to the bondholder of your country, are you willing to cheapen the dollar that you give to the toiling millions of your fellow-citizens? I care nothing for the bondholder; he can take care of himself. But I will not in any paroxysm of passion or resentment so far lose my sense of proportion and of justice that in order to do mischief to the rich bondholder, so called, I will work all this wreck and ruin to the masses of my countrymen.

When we talk about the wages of labor, I mean also agricultural labor. Who are the people who would be benefited by high prices? The man who holds the plow especially? Oh, no. It is the capitalist who owns the farm; it is the man who has invested his money in land. Is he not a capitalist? I am not talking about the man whom he hires; I am talking about the man who owns the land. For the sake of raising the price of the commodities on that land you seem reckless as to the consequences to a far larger number who will suffer by your action. Mr. President, I ask leave to print this table with my remarks:

I have another table here in regard to the wages of railroad employees, showing the same thing. With all this, recollect, there has been going on that very beneficent reform, a decrease in the hours of labor. There is larger pay now for the short hours than there was twenty, thirty, or forty years ago for the long hours. We must not forget that fact in estimating the conditions with which we are dealing.

Mr. President, let me, before I leave this subject, call your attention to some facts that I had the honor to lay before this Senate a year and a half ago in a speech which I made, and which I think are so pertinent to the present discussion that I make no apology for reproducing them. Here are some tables of prices agreed upon, taken from this same report, by Messrs. Kingsland & Douglas, successors of Kingsland, Fergeson & Co., Simmons Hardware Company, and Mansur & Tibbetts Implement Company, all of St. Louis, Mo. The price of a one-horse steel plow in money in 1889 was $2.75; in 1873, at the time of this demonetization, it was $6.50. But here is the interesting part. In 1889 it cost in bushels of wheat 3.8, in corn 8.5, and in oats 11.5. In 1873, instead of three bushels, it cost 6.4 bushels of wheat, 19.1 bushels of corn, and 27 bushels of oats.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that his figures are entirely wrong.

Mr. GRAY. They are not my figures.

Mr. TELLER. They are wrong, no matter whose figures they are. Wheat was worth $1.47 a bushel at that time.

Mr. GRAY. I will put this table in my remarks for what it is worth. As I said, these are not my figures. They are figures that were made under the instructions of Mr. Carroll D. Wright. The same can be said about the two-horse steel plow. In 1873 it cost 19.6 bushels of wheat, and in 1889 16.4. Without going through, for it goes through in that proportion, I wish these facts to go for what they are worth to the people of this country, to consider these things, so that hard as the lot of the farmer is, severe as his trials are, and I admit them to be, I want it to be considered that there has been an exaggeration about these general conditions. There has been an overstatement even in regard to the farmer himself, not the farm laborer, which it would be well for him when he comes to consider his political action to take into the account.

[1] For 1880.

Mr. President, there is a great outcry, I know, about hard times, and always will be. If you can point me to a time when some of the people of the country did not think the times were hard, I have not yet discovered it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me there?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is passing from the consideration of those figures rather abruptly.

Mr. GRAY. I am going back to them.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Colorado impugns their correctness. I understand they were collected by the gentleman who has charge of such matters. It seems to me if we can not rely upon those figures we had better get another man for the office.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know. There may have been an exceptionally high price for wheat in 1873. I am taking the figures as I find them in the statistics.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Delaware that there can be no mistake about the general price of wheat in 1873. It has been presented to the Senate, I suppose, two hundred times. There is certainly an error in that report. I do not know but that everything else in the table may be right.

Mr. GRAY. I have given the Senator my authority, and I do not undertake to do more. I did not make the investigation myself, of course. If these statistics are not reliable I will tell you what I believe is reliable; 1873 or some year thereabouts, perhaps——

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will pardon me a moment on that point—his speech is a very interesting and able one—I suggest whether those figures for 1873 are not placed in greenbacks. Is there any accounting for them on that ground?

Mr. GRAY. They are reduced to gold, I think. I suppose the Senator from Colorado did not understand that I was speaking of the price of these articles in bushels of wheat. I was not speaking of the money prices; I was speaking of the number of bushels of wheat it would take to buy a steel plow in 1873 and how many bushels of wheat it would take to buy it in 1889. The difference was very much in favor of 1889. The table does not give the price of wheat in 1873.

Mr. HILL. I understand that the only point questioned is the one single statement about the price of wheat; that is all. The rest of the table seems to be accurate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not say anything about the price——

Mr. GRAY. Here is another table, which I have quoted before, that was extracted from the Statistical Abstract by Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. He is my authority.

Mr. TELLER. Very good authority.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. WALKER says in this table that he has computed wages in 1860 and in 1885 in dollars, in weight of gold, and in grain. Now, it seems we are getting right down to the thing we are discussing. We are applying the test, which the Senator from Arkansas and, I think, all men as sensible as he will admit is the best test we can employ. The wages of factory hands in 1860 were as follows:

Dyers, 62 cents a day in 1860; in 1885 a dollar. In 1860 they got 16 grains of gold, and in 1885 they got 25.7 grains of gold.

Giggers—whatever they may be—62 cents in 1860, and 82 cents n 1885; 16 grains of gold in 1860, and 21.1 grains of gold in 1885.

Plain weavers, 65 cents a day in 1860, and 85 cents a day in 1885. In 1860 they got 16.7 grains of gold, and in 1885 21.8 grains of gold, and so the table goes through a dozen different occupations in a leather factory, beam and yard hands, blacksmiths, carpenters, etc., and gives the wages in grains of gold; and the difference between 1860 and 1885 is always in favor of 1885.

Mr. President, if there is anything to be gained by the free coinage of silver, if it will, indeed, so regulate prices that the masses of the people will be better off and the struggle for daily bread a little easier, in God's name let us have it. I do not know why I or why you should be excluded from the benefit that is to be diffused by legislation such as is proposed by this amendment. I have nothing not in common with the mass of my fellow-citizens. I have no interests that can be furthered by legislation that will not also redound to their benefit and advantage. I sail in the same boat with them, must encounter the same storms and perils, and am destined for the same haven, and I want no other fortune than to share with all, with each one, the humblest as well as the highest, whatever fate is in store for our common country. God forbid that there should be a difference in lot or in fortune. We differ as to the best mode of promoting these ends, which I acknowledge those who differ with me have in view as well as I, but I ask those who are pursuing honestly these ends to tell me why it is that, measured by this standard of labor, we find that the reward of the toiler has increased in gold in all these years we are speaking of and that the purchasing power has increased in all that time. Why should we seek to disturb it, and why are we not satisfied to let it remain where it is, rather than take the risk, as it seems to me must always obtain where a change in present conditions is proposed? Why take this leap in the dark?

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me one question at that point?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. In 1866, at the close of the war, our bonded indebtedness was $2,800,000,000 in round numbers. It is now practically $1,000,000,000. In 1866, at the close of the war, 2,800,000,000 bushels of wheat would have paid the bonded indebtedness of the United States at the then ruling prices—in fact, would have more than paid it. I want to ask the Senator how it is, if labor has been benefited, as he so eloquently portrayed, that it requires more bushels of wheat to-day, more pounds of cotton, and more of everything that the farm produces to pay the present billion dollars of national bonded indebtedness than it required in 1866, at the close of the war?

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator ask me that as a serious question?

Mr. ALLEN. I do.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator asks me why it will take more?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. It will take more because those commodities bring a lower price.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator argues that the prices of labor have increased.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; they have.

Mr. ALLEN. And the Senator has cited some statistics which are isolated and disjointed to prove that.

Mr. GRAY. I did not trouble the Senate and the Senator with reciting all the statistics I had. I only took one or two specimen bricks out of the tables to show what I meant. I had a number of tables to show it.

Mr. ALLEN. As what the Senator says will have a very great effect with the country, I wish to ask him if prices have been increased, if the farmer and the laborer have been so benefited, as the Senator says, how does it occur that it will require more products of the farm to-day to pay one-third of the bonded indebtedness of the United States as it existed in 1866 than it would have required to pay the entire indebtedness of almost $3,000,000,000 at that time?

Mr. GRAY. As the Senator seems to be serious enough in that question, I will repeat my answer. It will require more because the prices of those commodities have gone down. I have just been speaking of their decline. Prices, too, were abnormally high in 1865, owing to an inflated paper currency. As regards cotton, there was also the cotton famine of the preceding years to take into the account.

Mr. ALLEN. This is the point to which I wish to attract the Senator's attention. He has been contending that the laboring and producing classes have been benefited in consequence of higher wages, more remunerative wages, and that the reduction of some commodities in life, which he has not enumerated very extensively, has been due to the increased facilities for manufacturing, much as a railroad company when you sue it for damage done by a fire usually undertakes to prove that some mysterious traveler threw a lighted cigar and started the fire. The Senator is not definite in that respect. If it does take more bushels of wheat and of corn and more of all the products of the farm to pay the present one-third of the national bonded indebtedness, does the Senator believe that that redounds to the benefit of the producer?

Mr. GRAY. It seems to me that all those questions of the Senator answer themselves. I have been talking here for an hour, dwelling upon the fact that all these staple commodities have decreased in price. If you attempted to pay the bonded debt of the country, if you compare the bonded debt of the country with these commodities when the price is high, and then again the same bonded debt with those commodities when the price is low, it would take more to pay than when the price is high.

Mr. ALLEN rose.

Mr. GRAY. Wait one moment. Do not interrupt me at this point.

Of course it will; but suppose there was no bonded debt, suppose there was no national debt to compare these products with, does the Senator say that if these commodities had been reduced in price by causes other than the appreciation of gold that it is not a benefit to humanity and not a curse? Will the Senator answer me that question?

Mr. ALLEN. I was not paying strict attention.

Mr. GRAY. I am sorry. The Senator lost something by not paying strict attention. Now, will he let me repeat it?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. I say I have been discussing this question, and if it be admitted, as I think I have proved—but admitting for the sake of argument, if you please—that these commodities, cotton, wheat, corn, and many other staple commodities, have declined in price for reasons which I have been dwelling upon, not connected with the decline in the price of silver, I ask whether that decline was not a blessing to humanity and not a curse?

Mr. ALLEN. Not by any means, Mr. President, under the circumstances.

Mr. GRAY. Well, I have the Senator's answer. If he will pardon me. I should like to go on and finish.

Mr. ALLEN. Permit me one moment further.

Mr. GRAY. I am sorry the Senator preaches the gospel of high prices of the necessities of life.

Mr. ALLEN. I do under those circumstances. Under other circumstances I might preach another gospel.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. GRAY). Can two gospels inconsistent with each other both be true?

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear the Senator's remark.

Mr. HOAR. I did not address the Senator from Nebraska, if the Senator will pardon me. I made a suggestion to the Senator from Delaware. What I asked the Senator from Delaware was if two gospels inconsistent with each other could both be true. I repeat it.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly they may both be true, as I shall demonstrate to the Senator at another time.

What I wanted to put to the Senator from Delaware was this question: The Senator now admits, as I understand, that it requires as much of the product of the farm to pay the present national bonded indebtedness as it required in 1866 to pay almost three times that amount.

Mr. GRAY. That question answers itself.

Mr. ALLEN. If that be the case, how can the Senator stand here and contend that with falling prices of products the wages of those who produced those products have gone up?

Mr. GRAY. I only point to the fact. That seems to be a favorite argument, and I thank the Senator for having called my attention to it. It is paraded by Professor Andrews, president of one of the colleges, a most respectable authority, no doubt, and by somebody else, as if that were to settle this question. He exclaims, with a great deal of tragic emphasis, that a certain amount of cotton and wheat would have discharged the entire bonded indebtedness in 1866, and that twenty or twenty-five years afterwards, when more than half of it had been paid, the same amount of cotton and wheat was necessary to discharge the balance. That is about it. If commodities are cheaper, and if the labor which produces them has gone up all the time, who is hurt except the man who owns the land, who would have preferred to have the higher price? But are you going to sacrifice the stability of our country, to throw into confusion all the great transactions of the business of the world, in order to gratify the desire of the gentlemen who are fortunate enough now, as in the time of Horace, to own the soil and produce the crops which feed the multitude of the people? I do not begrudge them the high prices when they come naturally, but I do not want to legislate high prices to them. I do not want to make the flour, the bread, the meat, the wool, the clothes more costly to those who consume them in order that those who have produced them—and I presume made a profit, or they would not have produced them at all—may get a higher price. What is the injustice about that?

The same may be said as to Bessemer steel. It took so many tons of iron rails in 1865 to pay the debt of the United States—the product of the toil of as honest and hard-working men as ever struck an anvil with a hammer or stood in front of a furnace—it took so many tons, produced by their sweat and their toil, to pay the bonded debt of the United States in 1865, and yet twenty-five years afterwards, when half that debt had been paid, it would take just as many tons and more to pay the balance. How does that sound? Is there anything wrong about that? Would you put the iron rails and steel rails back to $187 a ton, and charge every man, woman, and child who rides upon a railroad a certain percentage of the cost, in order that the rail maker and the manufacturer might be able to pay the bonded debt in iron rails?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The trouble with the Senator's argument is that he loses sight constantly of the fact that it does not take one particle less human labor to produce a bale of cotton to-day than it did in 1865. Whether it does in Bessemer steel and other things is another question. Where improved modes have benefited production, it makes a material difference; but where there has been no improvement, where it takes the same amount of human labor—if he assumes that human labor is the proper measure—the Senator can not deny the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska when he speaks of wheat and cotton.

Mr. GRAY. I of course, Mr. President, would speak with great diffidence of the question of cotton raising with the Senator from Arkansas; but I venture to make the assertion that the Senator from Arkansas has in his enthusiasm lost sight of many labor-saving devices which stand between the planting of cotton in 1865 and its sale at Liverpool or Boston in the bale and the processes necessary in 1895. There is a difference in ginning; there is a difference in the gathering, all in favor of the planter. They are commencing, I am told, but do not know, to pick cotton by machinery. But certainly the Senator will not deny that since 1865 in preparing it for market, with hydraulic pressure a bale is compressed into one-third the bulk that it occupied twenty-five or thirty years ago, and there is a great difference in favor of the producer of cheaper cotton. A vessel can be loaded with three times as many bales on account of the reduction of bulk now as could have been loaded in 1865. There is also a difference in the respect that the waste products of cotton are utilized now, which were not then. The net value of the cotton seed produced last year, according to the memorandum which I have here, was about $27,000,000 to the producer, going a long way toward paying the cost of production. That in 1865 was absolutely lost. Should no account be made of this and of the improved fertilizers, the increased production that comes from better cultivation and from the use of phosphates, instead of the old costly and exhaustive guanos which were used to fertilize cotton?

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. On the prairies of the Northwest it formerly took seven or eight men to follow a binder and bind grain. To-day one boy drives the team and the harvester binds the grain. Therefore the cost of producing the wheat is reduced.

Mr. GRAY. There is no doubt about that. But then coming to another point of the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas as to the laborer who produces; I do not mean the labor of the land owner; I am not talking now about the capitalist; I am talking about the laborer, the man who goes into the field and plants the cotton, who hoes it, holding onto the handle of the hoe, the man who picks it with his own fingers—I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether that labor was better paid, or as well paid, in 1873 as it is to-day?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was better paid in 1865 than to-day, decidedly.

Mr. BERRY. It was much better paid in 1865.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Perhaps twice as much.

Mr. GRAY. I am not in a position to contradict the Senator from Arkansas, but I have only to say that, then, that labor is an exception to all other productive labor in this country, and I believe the Senator from Arkansas, when he examines the question more closely than perhaps he has done now, will find that he is very far from right in stating that that labor was as well paid then as now. I know that the farmers in my State complain—and with good reason—that with lower prices for grain they have to pay as high prices for labor as ever.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have lived on a cotton farm all my life, and if there is anything on the face of the earth I know, it is the condition of cotton farming. I am not mistaken.

Mr. GRAY. Very well. I still think, if the Senator will analyze the elements which go into and the return that comes from the cotton field hand and to the boy who plows and picks the cotton, he will find some reason to modify his statement. But be that as it may, whether it is better or is the same, all I have to say is that, measured by gold, gold has not appreciated. The Senator from Arkansas, who is kind enough to furnish me with his authority with regard to prices in the particular of which he spoke, calls to my attention another matter in which he is concerned, and about which I wish to make a single remark.

There has been a good deal said in the course of silver discussion of late years about the advantage which would accrue to this country if we adopted the silver standard. The Senator from Arkansas does not deprecate the conditions which are to follow from going upon a silver basis; in fact, he rather chants a note of joy at the prospect. He says that conditions will be happier, better, currency more stable, and business enterprises more encouraged. If I thought so I should be with him, of course; but thinking that he is entirely mistaken, and that the adoption of that measure would be fraught with ruin and trouble and disaster to my country, I want to show some of the reasons why it is inexpedient that we should take this leap in the dark at the present time, in order that we may have silver prices in this country, and thereby get the advantage which the Senator and many others say will come to us from trading with silver-standard countries. He says there is a distinct advantage in that; that the minister from Mexico, Mr. Romero, a most distinguished and eminent and estimable gentleman, in a recent article in the North American Review, in speaking of the advantages of silver in stimulating the exports from that country, has said certain things which he has commented upon.

If I understand anything about the process by which this beneficence is to be wrought to the country, it is this: Taking the example of Mexico, for instance, the products that are raised in that country, coffee, for example, as a staple product, will be sold for gold when it is exported, and with that gold you can come home and buy twice its nominal amount in silver money; that if you sell—using our own currency—a thousand dollars' worth of coffee for a thousand dollars' worth of gold you take that gold back to Mexico and get $2,000 in silver. I believe some such process as that is pointed out by which we are to arrive at this very felicitous condition.

Mr. President, think of it! Dislocate the money metals of your country, put yourself out of exchange with all the great gold-standard countries of the world in order that there may be a profit made on the exchange we get for the articles we export. Who makes that money? It is the capitalist, the gambler, and the speculator who makes it. How can anything be made if the cost of production, the wages of labor, are the same or have appreciated in proportion to the price of commodities in silver? If it costs as much in silver to raise the coffee in proportion as it did in gold, then where is the profit? If you pay your labor in the field or in the coffee plantation higher wages because you pay him in silver, if you pay for transportation larger rates because you pay in silver, if you pay the commission merchant higher commissions because you pay in silver, if all these things have gone up together, then where is the profit? No, Mr. President; the profit is to the capitalist; the profit is to the man who owns the land and sells for gold the thing that he has raised and produced by paying gold wages or nearly gold wages in silver—I mean nominally in silver. That is confessed in the very article quoted by the Senator from Arkansas from Mr. Romero. Says Mr. Romero in the article read by the Senator from Arkansas:

> We have more stability of prices, wages, rents, etc.
> Those things concern the capitalist—
> Although our wages are low——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Read the remainder.

Mr. GRAY. The article continues:

> Although our wages are low, there has been in recent years a marked tendency to their increase.

Is there anything about increasing wages up to a gold standard? Not a word. If he receives 50 cents a day in silver, he receives it whether he sells for gold or no, and there is where the profit comes in, and the only way in which it will work an advantage by being on the silver basis and making it out of the exchange.

He says on page 707 of the magazine containing that article:

> While the fall of silver and free coinage in Mexico have not given to the Mexican silver coins, when converted into foreign exchange or sold for gold, any value other than that of the silver bullion contained in the same, nevertheless the purchasing power of the silver dollar is now, on the whole, as great in Mexico as it ever was.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the Mexican silver dollar to which he alludes.

Mr. GRAY. I know it is the Mexican silver dollar. The Senator from Arkansas said further in his speech:

> England's great wealth is the result of her commerce, and perhaps her most profitable customers are the silver-using countries. How her trade with these nations is handicapped we see forcibly set out by Mr. Romero in what has just been quoted. These drawbacks greatly embarrass British merchants in their dealings, and they would gladly rid themselves of them; but other interests in Great Britain, the bankers, for instance, in London, intent upon their own gains, by reason of the increase in the value of gold, are unwilling to heed the complaints of the merchants about the difficulties they are compelled to endure.

Yet the Senator from Colorado the other day in his speech read a very interesting article from the Statist to show that the last year of commerce in Great Britain with all the countries of the world had been the most productive and the most profitable in the history of that great country.

Mr. TELLER. Simply because of low prices.

Mr. GRAY. Simply because of low prices. I am only showing the difference between the statement of the Senator from Arkansas and that made on the authority of the Statist by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator for calling my attention to this number of the North American Review and to that interesting article by Mr. Mulhall, a very distinguished and well-known statistician. He quotes from him to show that the United States of America in the year 1895 is, in all the elements that go to make up the wealth of a nation, the greatest, the strongest that the world has ever seen; and that the productive power and the intelligence and economic forces that in this country are at work for the blessing of mankind have had no parallel in the past history of the world. That is all true; and yet with that statement, indorsed by the distinguished authority of the Senator from Arkansas, we have these lamentations over the condition of the country which only this extreme and desperate remedy of the free coinage of silver can be relied upon to cure. Mr. Mulhall does say a great deal more. He says:

> It is not merely that European nations are deprived of the labor, skill, and exertions of 4,000,000 men in the prime of life; they have also to set apart 1,000,000 workers of the agricultural and industrial classes to feed and clothe the standing armies and defray the cost of artillery, war vessels, etc. Thus the average of productive energy in France, Germany, England, etc., is much less than appears in the above statement. Again, if we consider the labor-saving appliances in the United States, we see the perfection of agricultural and other machinery. Take, for example, the reaping machine commonly used in the Western States, which will cut and bind grain at the rate of 45 minutes per acre. On this point it may be well to compare the production of grain and meat in various countries with the number of hands employed in agriculture in 1890:

Countries.	Hands employed.	Grain.	Meat.	Product per hand.
				Grain.	Meat.
		Tons.	Tons.	Bushels.	Pounds.
United States	8,760,000	76,600,000	4,830,000	350	1,230
United Kingdom	2,469,000	7,330,000	1,140,000	119	1,090
France	6,910,000	16,900,000	1,200,000	98	350
Germany	8,120,000	15,100,000	1,370,000	75	380
Austria	10,680,000	17,100,000	1,080,000	64	230
Italy	5,400,000	5,300,000	360,000	39	150

> An ordinary farm hand in the United States raises as much grain as three in England, four in France, five in Germany, or six in Austria, which shows what an enormous waste of labor occurs in Europe, because farmers are not possessed of the same mechanical appliances as in the United States. In order to make the comparison of labor more exact, I may be permitted to reduce all farm products to common denominator of grain by supposing 10 pounds of meat or 2 gallons of wine to be equal to a bushel, and then the account will stand thus:
> Bushels of grain per hand.
United States	475	Germany	118
United Kingdom	228	Italy	115
France	188	Austria	97
> While the above is the general result for the United States, as compared with other countries.

That is, in the United States there are produced 475 bushe s of grain per head of those employed in the production; in the United Kingdom, 228 bushels; in France, 188 bushels; in Germany, 118 bushels; in Italy, 115 bushels; and in Austria, 97 bushels. He says:

> Mr. Atkinson, in his book on the Distribution of Products, shows that in some of the Western States the labor of one man during three hundred days in the year is equivalent to the production of 4,500 bushels of wheat, while the cutting, thrashing, milling, and conveyance to market represent the annual labor of three other men. Thus four men can produce and deliver to the bakers as much flour as will feed a thousand persons, at 12 ounces of bread daily, for a whole year. In other words, one man can feed 250, whereas in Europe one man feeds only 30 persons.

Mr. Mulhall says something else that is interesting. There is a good deal said about the distress of this country, that the poor are growing poorer, while the rich are growing richer, and that certain sections of this country are suffering the blight of despair and want which nothing but this extreme remedy will cure. This statistician, indorsed by the Senator from Arkansas, has given us some interesting figures obtained from the census of the United States. He gives the wealth of the United States, which he says is the greatest of any country in the world, dividing it into groups. The wealth of the New England States in 1850 was $1,129,000,000; in 1870 it was $3,237,000,000; in 1890 it was $5,233,000,000, a large increase, but a little less than 100 per cent for New England in 1890 over 1870.

For the second group of States I omit 1870, right after the war and before there had been any recovery from its devastations. Taking 1880, $6,448,000,000 is the wealth put down for that group of States, whereas in 1890 it was $9,928,000,000, or as the French say, nine milliards nine hundred and twenty-eight millions, an increase of 330 per cent over 1880.

I know that there is much yet to be done. I know that there are want and suffering everywhere. I know that the ravages of war have not yet all been completely mended and restored. There is much yet for a brave and intelligent people to do, and the necessity for doing it will continue; but, Mr. President, it is gratifying to know by these sources of information that after all there is this remarkable and pleasing increase in the wealth of that fair section of our country; that her sons and daughters have turned to building up the waste places of the war and that they are succeeding. And it is no friend, as I conceive it, who tells them that in place of availing themselves of all that invention, all that improvement and science and enterprise have done to ameliorate the condition of human labor, they are to destroy and dislocate the money of the country, throw away the stability which obtains with the standard which we now have in gold, drive out of circulation one-half of our metal money, and relegate us to the silver basis in order that the prices, the nominal prices only, of cotton or wheat may be enhanced.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I have been detained from the Senate by indisposition and I do not exactly understand the Senator's position. I should like to know it.

Mr. GRAY. I am too tired to explain it over.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know if the Senator is entirely content with the present arrangement in the United States as between the two metals—gold and silver—as currency for the people.

Mr. GRAY. I am not entirely content by any means with the present financial condition of the United States so far as the Government has relations to it.

Mr. GEORGE. I confine my question simply to gold and silver.

Mr. GRAY. I think the relation now existing between gold and silver in the United States, I will say in answer to the Senator from Mississippi, is the best possible that can be obtained. I do not believe that there would be any difficulty in maintaining the equal purchasing power and equal circulation and parity of the gold and silver now coined in the United States if the disturbing forces which exist, and to which I alluded in the earlier part of my remarks, were removed.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand the Senator not to be in favor of an increased use of silver by an international agreement?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will excuse me and relieve me from going into international bimetallism. That is aside from the purpose of my remarks, and I have already fatigued the Senate as well as myself by the length at which I have spoken.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator unwilling to answer that question?

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no; but I hope the Senator will relieve me from further interruption. I have told him what I think about it.

Mr. GEORGE. I should be very glad to know, if the Senator is willing to tell me.

Mr. GRAY. As I have stated, I think if we could relieve the Treasury from this unnatural, abnormal banking function; if we could retire the greenbacks and restore the Treasury to its natural and old-time function of honestly collecting and honestly disbursing the public revenue, and leave to the commercial activities of the country the creation of credit money and of those credit devices which modern business and modern methods have made necessary for accomplishing the exchanges of commerce and modern life——

Mr. GEORGE rose.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator must pardon me. That is what I think should be done; and I think that then the greatest possible amount of silver that could ever be made to circulate in parity with gold would be made to circulate in the United States of America just as it circulates in France to-day, and it will continue to circulate here if only the disturbing causes that I have mentioned were removed. But, Mr. President, that reminds me to say that the only way in which we can have bimetallism, the only way in which these two metals coined can circulate at a parity, it seems to me, is by a gold standard with such limited and regulated use of silver as we have now in existence in this country of ours. But, if we are relegated to a silver standard we can not maintain a gold circulation in connection with silver, but we shall have an absolutely monometallic standard, and that of silver instead of gold.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to say that he has not answered my question?

Mr. GRAY. I do not expect to answer it any further, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has been enjoying a nap while I have been talking, and he has come in at the end of my speech and expects me to repeat the argument for his benefit or amusement, I do not know which, and certainly I am not equal to that task.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want any argument. It can be settled by saying yes or no, without making any argument.

Mr. GRAY. But I want to get through. Mr. President, I have wearied the Senate overlong I know, and I have been more desultory than I intended to be or would wish to be, but I can not close without referring to the very interesting and able discussion that this question received yesterday from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. He admits frankly, for I think he has come down as close to the real question as anyone who has discussed it, as follows:

> The question of the restoration of the coinage of silver upon terms of exact equality with gold, when reduced to its last analysis, is whether the basis of the money of final payment shall be narrowed to the possible supply of gold coin, or whether it shall be broadened so as to include the available supply of both gold and silver for coinage as primary standard money.
> The resultant of this last analysis must embrace both the gold and the silver coin, each with equal current interchangeable value with the other. For otherwise there would necessarily be practically either gold monometallism or silver monometallism.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that unless there is absolute interchangeable value between the two metals resulting from the passage of a 16 to 1 coinage measure, then necessarily there will be either gold monometallism or silver monometallism, and that is what no one desires, so far as I can learn from what has been said on this floor in this connection. It seems to me unless you can show that the free coinage of silver will produce, by the increased demand or whatever other reason may be alleged, an exact equivalent between 16 ounces of silver and 1 ounce of gold, then you have failed to show that the change that is proposed is either safe or desirable. The Senator from Georgia admits it. I think the Senator from Arkansas admits it.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator whether he would be satisfied with that sort of interchangeableness of value which occurred and existed for eighty-one years in the United States, from the foundation of the Government to 1873?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know that I should be perfectly satisfied with it. From 1853 until gold and silver both went out we were practically on a gold monometallic basis. Silver was more valuable than gold, and disappeared from circulation. We were then just where the Senator from Georgia said we would be, that we would be sure to be on one or the other. We were on a gold monometallic basis and we got along very well. Nobody suffered very much.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator assert that we were on a gold monometallic basis from 1792 down to 1873?

Mr. GRAY. No; a part of the time we were on a silver monometallic basis, thereby confirming the proposition of the Senator from Georgia as a sound proposition of monetary economics, that unless you have a parity between the 16 ounces of silver and the 1 ounce of gold you are to have either a monometallism of gold or of silver, as the case may be.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion just there?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Bimetallism does not consist in having both forms of money always circulating at the same time. It consists in giving an opportunity to everyone to circulate them if he chooses.

Mr. GRAY. That is a new phase. I do not mean that I never heard it before.

Mr. TELLER. It is not a new phase. It is a phase that everyone who studies this question will admit. If the Senator will allow me a moment further, I will say the assertion that because one of the metals for a time disappears you have not bimetallism is not recognized, I think, in the best circles of economic thought.

Mr. GRAY. I did not mean to say that it was necessarily new to me. I have seen such a statement, and I can understand the Senator from Colorado when he repeats it here; but so far as the arguments that are treated here and we are considering to-day it is a new phase of the question. The Senator from Georgia, and I think the Senator from Arkansas—certainly the Senator from Georgia—stated what I believe to be accurately true, and he addressed himself to the very point of the controversy. As a good lawyer he sought a distinct issue and addressed himself to it, and that was as I have read. Further on he says:

This is the basic, fundamental proposition in favor of bimetallism. Is this proposition true? If it is——

Mr. BACON. The Senator is reading that in connection with another proposition altogether.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I thought it explained itself. I will read back, although I wanted to abbreviate the time I was taking.

The strength of the argument in favor of bimetallism is based on the fact that the use of both metals is necessary to supply the amount of money of final payment required to do the business of the world—for the reason that all the gold in the world available for coinage is, taken by itself, insufficient for this purpose; and that all the silver in the world available for coinage, taken by itself, is likewise insufficient for this purpose.

This is the basic, fundamental proposition in favor of bimetallism. Is this proposition true? If it is, then the restoration of bimetallism with the use of both gold and silver as the money of final payment can not be overestimated, and there can be no higher obligation on the statesmanship of the country than to find a speedy way for its accomplishment. If it is not true, but if on the contrary it is a fact that there is enough of gold available for coinage to answer all the needs of the world as the money of final payment, then for myself I am ready to admit that the question of bimetallism, and the question which it involves of the restoration of silver as primary money, except so far as they concern debts previously contracted, are comparatively unimportant questions.

The Senator from Georgia did not think that I intended to misrepresent him?

Mr. BACON. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. GRAY. I saw that the latter part of the proposition I commenced to read explained what I was discussing.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, of course, Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to have the statement go on record that it was an inadvertency.

Mr. GRAY. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it. I would not misrepresent him or any other man for the world, but you will see the latter part of the proposition I commenced to read will explain what I was reading. That with the increase in the production of gold, with the enormous improvement in the appliances for mining, with the increased annual output that the last three years has seen of the world's production, there is not enough gold, the Senator says is the basic proposition, and he stands upon it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize that an increased production in an agricultural article, for instance, wheat, which doubles the farm production necessarily doubles the world's supply.

Mr. GRAY. I understand what the Senator means.

Mr. BACON. But the production of a precious metal is something which relates to the accumulation of a thousand years.

Mr. GRAY. I understand.

Mr. BACON. I know you understand it, but I want to state it.

Mr. GRAY. But the Senator is stating it in my time. I am perfectly willing to answer a question.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to call your attention to the difference. The Senator is talking about a largely increased production. If the increased production were double what it is now, it would not amount to one-fortieth of the supply now on hand, and it would take a large number of years to bring the supply of the standard money of final payment up to what was the former supply, represented by the aggregate of both gold and silver.

Mr. GRAY. Now, that is all true, but it does not at all affect what I was saying. Though that is true, it is also true that the world's product of gold is increasing, and from all the accounts we have it is likely to increase in the future. So it is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that in place of the enormous output of $180,000,000 during the last year the next returns will show over $200,000,000. Whether that increase be a large or small increment, as compared with the stock of gold, nevertheless the fact remains that it is an increasing amount and not a decreasing amount, and that with all the world's appliances for a diminished use of hard money in the exchanges of life, that accumulated supply, such as it is, is proving itself sufficient, for I have shown, I think, by what I have stated in regard to the value of labor measured in grains of gold, that gold has not appreciated in the years composing the period with which we are concerned.

If it has not appreciated, then it seems to me the inference is necessary and absolute that there is a sufficient supply to perform the money functions of the world; and if that be so, why should we give up the stability and certainty that such a standard makes for the business of the world and relegate ourselves to a cheaper money and one in which we will constantly be going through the calculation of the money changers in order to put ourselves in touch with the great gold standard and consuming countries of the globe? We ought not to undertake such difficulties. We ought not to bring upon ourselves such burdens unless there is a necessity for it, which I contend has not been shown by any advocate of this amendment from the committee.

Mr. President, I must apologize to the Senate for having taken so much of its time, and if Senators will give me their consent to include in my printed remarks some of the tables which I did not read in full, I will thank them for the attention they have given me and not detain them longer.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend at this hour of the day to enter into a discussion of this question. I did not like to interrupt the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] because I saw he did not care to be interrupted, but his concluding statement has waived the necessity of any inquiry. He denies emphatically that gold has appreciated. I want to say that the most distinguished representative of the gold monometallic system in the world, the great statistician of Great Britain, Dr. Giffen, has on sundry occasions frankly admitted the appreciation of gold to the full extent of any claim made by the silver men. I wish to say to the Senator, also, that the Statist, a leading financial paper of the world, published at London, has admitted that in its columns for the last two years without controversy. I will say to the Senator, further, that there are not more than two men in Europe who have an international reputation as political economists who are to-day denying the appreciation of gold to the extent of nearly 40 per cent. One of those statisticians is an Englishman and the other is a Frenchman. They are both quoted in the public press of the country at different times in defense of the gold monometallic system, and they deny it. Practically all the rest of the men who contend for the gold standard in Europe admit it. I will take occasion to talk about this matter at some other time, but not to-night

I wish to say that when the Senator from Delaware compares the present purchasing power of gold with labor, and then takes the day laborer, he ought to bear in mind that the labor organizations of this country have maintained, in spite of all other influences, aided and assisted by a system of tariff, the wages for the men who work for day's wages, and undoubtedly the statement is true that they are in better condition now than they have ever been.

Mr. HILL. Under the Wilson tariff?

Mr. TELLER. That is, they have been until recently. The Senator from Delaware seems to address himself in his inquiry, and his interest is only manifestly to, the men who hire out by the day. Does not the Senator know that there are multitudes of people in the United States who do not work for day's wages? Does he not know that the great productive agencies of this country are carried on by the men who take part and share in the profit. Does he not know more, that the labor organizations of this country have been at war with the capital of this country to maintain their wages, and does he not remember that two years ago he saw, as I saw, the United States Army called out to prevent the labor organizations of this country from waging war to maintain wages? Does he think that this is a condition that the country can continue in?

I will not interfere with Senators who have given notice, but some other day, if not upon this bill upon ome other, I shall undertake to show from the best authorities in the world that the consenus of opinion, no matter what a man believes about gold or silver, is that there has been an appreciation of gold from 30 to 40 per cent, and it is a late hour to come in here and contend that that is not to-day an admitted fact, because the Senator can find one or two articles in the great catalogue of production that may not have fallen as silver has fallen with the general range of products. Locke said when one product had fallen it might be presumed that the vice was in that product, but he said when all things fall the vice must be in the money.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to-morrow morning, I shall submit a few observations upon the pending bill.

DEATH OF HON. FREDERICK REMANN.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. Frederick Remann, late a member-elect of the House from the State of Illinois, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions of the House of Representatives were read by the Secretary, as follows:

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 29, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say as to the message of the President referred yesterday to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that he finds on examination it should have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if there is no objection, the reference will be corrected accordingly.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BRAINERD AND NORTHERN MINNESOTA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, and to its assigns, the right of way for the extension of its railroad, with necessary side tracks and switch tracks, and for a telegraph and telephone line, through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation, commencing at a point in the south line of said Indian reservation and extending northwesterly through section 11, of township 141, range 31, to a point in the west line of said reservation in section 2; also through the Chippewa Indian Reservation, in said State, commencing at a point in the south line of said Indian reservation and extending northwesterly through sections 1, 12, 13, 24, 25, and 36, in township 143, range 32, sections 18, 19, 20, 29, 30, 31, and 32, in township 143, range 31; section 1, in township 142, range 32, and sections 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9, in township 142, range 31, to a point in the west line of said reservation, with the right to load logs on said railroad at the points in said reservation where the same may run adjacent or contiguous to the waters of Leech Lake. Such right of way shall be 50 feet in width on each side of the central line of said railroad, and said company shall also have the right to take from the lands adjacent to the line of said road material, stone, and earth necessary for the construction of said railroad; also grounds adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, and to an extent not exceeding one station within the limits of said reservation: Provided, That no part of such lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as are necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad line, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall be taken.

SEC. 2. That before said railroad shall be constructed through any land, claim, or improvement held by individual occupants according to any treaties or laws of the United States, compensation shall be made such occupant or claimant for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railroad. In case of failure to make satisfactory settlement with any such claimant, the United States district court at St. Paul or Duluth, Minn., shall have jurisdiction, upon petition of either party, to determine such just compensation in accordance with the laws of Minnesota provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes; and the amount of damages resulting to the tribe or tribes of Indians pertaining to said reservation in their tribal capacity, by reason of the construction of said railroad through such lands of the reservation as are not occupied in severalty shall be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and be subject to his final approval: Provided, however, That said railroad company may file with the Secretary of the Interior a bond, in such amount and with such sureties as the Secretary shall approve, conditioned for the payment of just compensation for said right of way to said individual occupants and to said tribe or tribes, as hereinbefore provided, and said company may thereupon proceed to construct and operate its railroad across said reservation.

SEC. 3. That said company shall cause maps, showing the route of its line through said reservation, and including the grounds for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior before constructing any portion of said railroad.

SEC. 4. That said company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservation for the purpose of surveying and locating its line of railroad: Provided, That said railroad shall be located and constructed with due regard to the rights of the Indians and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of he Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless the road shall be constructed through the said reservation within three years after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. EDDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3009) entitled "A bill granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota," hereby report the same back to the House of Representatives, with the recommendation that section 1 of said bill be amended as follows, to wit:

First. By striking out all of line 15, after the word "Reservation," and all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and the word "thirty-one," in line 33, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "in township 142 north, of range 31 west, and extending in a northwesterly direction from the terminus of the line as now constructed along the most feasible and practicable route through said township, and through townships 143 north, of ranges 31 and 32 west."

Second. After the word "buildings," in line 32 of said section 1, by striking out all the remainder of the line, and the words "water stations," in line 33.

Third. After the word "said," in line 36 of said section 1, and before the word "Reservation," inserting the word "Chippewa."

And that as thus amended the bill do pass.

The amendments offered to this bill are in conformity with the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose letter is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 18, 1896.

SIR: I am in receipt of a communication from W. M. Griffith, esq., clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives, dated the 8th instant, with which he submits for the views of this office several bills, among them H. R. 3009, "A bill granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota." Mr. Griffith states that by resolution of the Committee on Indian Affairs the bills were referred to this office for report.

The bill grants the company a right of way through section 11, in township 141 north, of range 31 west, within the Leech Lake Reservation, and through certain sections in townships 142 and 143 north, of ranges 31 and 32 west, within the Chippewa Reservation, with the right to load logs on said railroad at the points in said reservations where the same may run adjacent to the waters of Leech Lake, such right of way to be 50 feet in width on each side of the central line of the road; also ground adjacent to the right of way for station purposes, to the extent of one station within the limits of the Chippewa Reservation.

In reporting upon the bill I desire, in the first place, to invite your attention to the fact that by act of Congress approved July 6, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 99), the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company was granted right of way through sections 13, 12, 1, and 2, in township 141 north, of range 31 west, within the Leech Lake Reservation. When the company came to make its survey for the line of definite location, on account of the topography of the country it found it necessary to pass through section 11 of said township and range also. This the said act did not give it a right to do; so it now seeks a right of way through said section, in the nature of an amendment to said act, giving it a right to go through sections 13, 12, 1, and 2. I am informally advised by Mr. FLETCHER, member of Congress from Minnesota, who introduced the bill, that the road is already constructed and in operation through the Leech Lake Reservation.

After constructing through the Leech Lake Reservation the company now finds it desirable to construct through a portion of the Chippewa Reservation; so instead of merely asking for an amendment to the old act permitting it to pass through said section 11, in the Leech Lake Reservation, it seeks also a right of way from the present terminus of its line in a northwesterly direction through a portion of the Chippewa Reservation. To secure this object the company has deemed it necessary to introduce a new bill.

The bill in question, after a description of the lands through which the company desires to pass, is substantially identical with the former act of Congress granting the company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation.

In office letter of December 21, 1894, in reporting upon House bill 54, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, a bill granting the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company a right of way through certain Indian reservations in Minnesota, and in office letter of the 15th instant, in reporting upon Senate bill 1035, a bill granting the Sioux City and Omaha Railway Company a right of way through the Omaha and Winnebago reservations, this office invited attention to certain veto messages of the President last year returning certain bills without his approval granting railroad companies rights of way through Indian reservations. These veto messages took exception to the liberality that has recently been manifested in granting companies rights of way through Indian lands. The President, judging from these messages, seems to think that companies should not receive such liberal grants as to side tracks, switches, turn-outs, and water stations, and as to station privileges generally; that the consent of the Indians should be obtained, and that Indians should not be compelled to seek redress in controversies with the company in courts that are located long distances from their reservations.

As regards the bill in question, I think by slight amendments the objections which the President has raised to such bills can be obviated. As regards obtaining the consent of the Indians, I do not think it important in this instance, as the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, under the provisions of the act of Congress of January 14, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 642), have ceded all their right, title, and interest in and to said reservation lands not allotted to them in severalty under the provisions of said act. So far as this office is aware, the line of road as proposed would not interfere with any of the allotted lands; but for fear it should, I deem it important that it should provide for this contingency. This it already does.

In an informal conference with Mr. FLETCHER, he suggested that an amendment be made in the description of the line of route of the road through the Chippewa Reservation. I accordingly respectfully recommend that section 1 of the bill be amended as follows: Strike out all of line 15, after the word "Reservation," all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and the word "thirty-one" in line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "In township 142 north, of range 31 west, and extending in a northwesterly direction from the terminus of the line as now constructed along the most feasible and practicable route, through said township and through townships 143 north, of ranges 31 and 32 west."

After the word "buildings," in line 32 of said section 1, strike out all the remainder of the line, and the words "water stations" in line 38.

After the word "said," in line 36 of said section 1, and before the word "Reservation," insert the word "Chippewa."

Were it not that the company already has a right of way through a portion of the Leech Lake Reservation, as has been explained, I would suggest an amendment to section 2 of the bill regarding the method of determining the amount of compensation that shall be paid the Indians.

If the amendments herein suggested shall be made, this office will interpose no objections to the passage of the bill.

The copy of the bill submitted by Mr. Griffith and a copy of this report are inclosed herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The amendments recommended in the report were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BADGE OF SONS OF VETERANS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 102) authorizing the wearing of the distinctive badge adopted by the Sons of Veterans, United States of America, upon all occasions of ceremony.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the distinctive badge adopted by the Sons of Veterans, United States of America, may be worn, in their own right, upon all public occasions of ceremony, by officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy of the United States who are members of said organization.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEE IN DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up now the report of the Committee on Accounts which was under consideration last evening.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution of January 14, directing the Doorkeeper of the House to employ Willis Bolls as an additional employee in the document room during the Fifty-fourth Congress, to be paid at the rate of $100 per month out of the contingent fund of the House, to prepare the bills of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses for binding, as provided for in the act of January 12, 1895, beg to report that they have made investigation of the subject, and respectfully submit and recommend the adoption of the following as a substitute for the same:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ some suitable person as an additional employee in the document room to prepare for binding the bills of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses, as provided for in the act of January 12, 1895, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,000 per annum during the Fifty-fourth Congress, or that portion thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of said act, out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute recommended by the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution what increase over the force carried during the last fiscal year has been already made at this session?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. None whatever.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not sure that my question has been understood.

What I desire to know is what, if this resolution shall be adopted, will be the total increase of force made at this session over that which was carried under the law of last year.

Mr. ODELL. One man.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the gentleman quite sure that he is correct about that?

Mr. ODELL. One man in the House document room is all the increase that this resolution provides for.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is correct as to the House document room, but that was not the subject of my inquiry. What I desire to know is, what is the total increase of force made in this House over the force carried during the third session of the last Congress?

Mr. ODELL. That is a question that I can not answer offhand.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman's statement is correct so far as the House document room is concerned, but I desire now to call attention to the increases already made in this Congress over the force carried in the last Congress. These increases have been made by special resolutions. Up to this time there has been an increase of three clerks in the document room, two clerks to Committees on Elections, three assistant clerks—one to the Committee on Military Affairs, one to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and one to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; one press-gallery messenger, one special messenger, and two assistant clerks to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, making a total increase of twelve clerks, at an annual compensation of $15,876. These are independent of the four employees allowed to the minority.

Now, if we deduct from these twelve additional employees the three assistants in the document room (who prior to the third session of the last Congress were carried in the legislative bill) and the two additional clerks to the Committees on Elections, made necessary by the organization of the additional committees, or rather by the subdivision of the Committee on Elections into three parts, we find a net increase, if I remember aright, of the force up to the present time of seven employees with salaries amounting to about $10,000.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please state now how many men were carried on the rolls in the last session of Congress that are not now on the force, having been employed especially for that session?

Mr. DOCKERY. The statement which I have just read includes all the information I have at this moment.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Were there not three more clerks employed in the post-office in the last Congress than are employed there now?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that a statement, including the information he calls for, was prepared by a gentleman who never makes mistakes, and I had it in my possession, but, being compelled to leave before the holidays, I turned it over to a distinguished gentleman on the other side of the House, who has mislaid it, so that I can not at this time furnish the gentleman the special information he desires. The statement I have here was prepared hurriedly, but, as I have said, by a gentleman who never makes mistakes——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Who is he? I would like to know that man's name. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. And that gentleman assures me that the increase is just as I have stated it here.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. ODELL. I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri to make an explanation in regard to the special messenger to whom he has referred. I have no knowledge of any such special messenger.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a gentleman by the name of Coombs, formerly Department messenger.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. He was created an officer at the special instance and request of the gentleman's side of the House. If those gentlemen do not want him, we shall be very glad to relieve them of him.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am dealing now, Mr. Speaker, with facts. The facts, I am quite sure, are as I have stated them. I have given the items, and, as I believe, with accuracy. There has been, if I am not mistaken, a net increase of seven employees, at a cost of about $10,000.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to examine into this "net increase" of which the gentleman speaks. In the first place, it is not an increase so far as the force in the document room is concerned.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is conceded. There has been an increase in the number of clerks to several important committees. As the Speaker and members of the House will remember, this House created at this session three Committees on Elections instead of one, as heretofore. This step was made necessary by the unusual number of election contests. To create a committee on elections without creating a clerk would be a ridiculous piece of business. It became necessary, therefore, to create two additional clerks. That was done.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have so stated.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well, sir; you have not deducted those. The special employees on our side of the House have not been increased in the least. I wish to examine the statement to which the gentleman has referred; and I wish he would give us the name of this gentleman who "never makes any mistakes."

Mr. DOCKERY. I will assume that responsibility myself. I will admit that I am subject to that impeachment. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] is examining that statement, I should like to be heard a moment or two. If he will yield the floor he can have it again in a few moments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I gladly yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to oppose the adoption of this resolution; that is to say, I oppose its adoption upon the ground on which it is based. If it is necessary to create a new office, as contemplated in this resolution, let it be created; but I am opposed to its creation on the premises stated. What does the resolution say:

That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ some suitable person as an additional employee in the document room to prepare for binding the bills of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses, as provided for in the act of January 12, 1895, at the rate of $1,000 a year.

The act here referred to—the act of January 12, 1895—is what is known as "the printing law." Now, I say it is as unreasonable to lay upon that law the necessity for the creation of this office as it is to lay upon it other things, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has undertaken to do on former occasions. I will read the section of the printing law which, as I understand, it is claimed makes this officer necessary. I understand the section referred to to be section 82. That is the section of the act of January 12, 1895, which it is said makes it necessary that we should have a new officer at a salary of $1,000 a year for the whole term of this Congress, unless otherwise ordered. That section reads as follows:

That the Public Printer shall bind four sets of Senate and House of Representatives bills, joint and concurrent resolutions, of each Congress, two for the Senate and two for the House, to be furnished him from the files of the Senate and House document room, the volumes, when bound, to be kept there for reference.

Mr. ODELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. ODELL. Does the gentleman from Tennessee know that those bills have been bound up to and including the Forty-fourth Congress, but from the Forty-fifth Congress down to the present time they are unbound, scattered around loose in the document room?

Mr. RICHARDSON. My friend says that, beginning with the Forty-fifth Congress down to and including the Fifty-third, these bills have not been bound; that may be true; and it may be very desirable to bind them. I am not antagonizing that proposition. But the assumption is that the act of January 12, 1895, authorized this binding.

Mr. ODELL. It certainly did so far as the past Congress was concerned.

Mr. SAYERS. May I be allowed a question in this connection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Does this resolution contemplate increasing the force in the document room?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly. It contemplates increasing the force in the Clerk's document room by the addition of one man—to do what? To furnish to the Public Printer two copies of the bills and joint and concurrent resolutions of the House; and I suppose if this be adopted it will be assumed to be necessary for the Senate to increase its force by the addition of one man, at $1,000 a year, to furnish to the Public Printer two copies of all Senate bills, concurrent and joint resolutions.

Now, what I want to say in conclusion is that the printing act, to which reference has been made, never contemplated the employment of an extra clerk to hand two copies of these bills over to the Public Printer to be bound.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the urgent deficiency bill contained an appropriation to retain an employee whose time had expired and whose appointment was not made at the organization of this House; so that you have the regular employee and will have also this other employee in addition.

Mr. ODELL. I beg to differ with the gentleman from Texas. I have investigated the matter, having been the subcommittee appointed for that purpose. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I understand from Mr. Grayson, who has been doing this work and has been employed here for many years, that it is absolutely necessary that this appointment should be made.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Grayson is provided for independently of the regular organization of the House.

Mr. ODELL. This does not provide for Mr. Grayson.

Mr. SAYERS. But provision has already been made for him.

Mr. ODELL. It is not included in this resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. Why is it necessary to have another man if the House has already provided for the employment of Mr. Grayson in the urgent deficiency bill? That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. ODELL. Because there are many thousands of these bills still unbound, and which must be taken care of.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to resume the floor for a moment. I wish to say only this in conclusion, that if it is necessary that there shall be an extra clerk appointed to compile these bills of former Congresses, let the Committee on Accounts bring in their proposition and assume the responsibility for creating that appointment.

Mr. ODELL. We do assume it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But let them not say that the act of January 12, 1895, requires it. That provision in the printing bill, it is true, did not say "hereafter," but only that there should be two copies furnished of each bill to the Public Printer to be bound, which means hereafter. We did not undertake to go back to the Forty-fifth Congress, but provided simply that there should be furnished to the Public Printer two copies of each bill for the purpose contemplated; and it was not designed that we should create an office and appoint an officer whose duties would take him back to that Congress to do the work. And I repeat, if it is desired to do so, you ought to put it into your own bill. We did not create the office in the act in question and did not provide for any such appointment in that act; for under that bill the appointment is not necessary.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a few moments——

Mr. ODELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for this appointment, or rather the law which makes this appointment necessary, grows out of the printing bill of last year, and is in this language:

> The Public Printer shall bind four sets of Senate and House of Representative bills and joint and concurrent resolutions of each Congress, two for the Senate and two for the House, to be furnished him from the files of the Senate and House document room, the volumes when bound to be kept there for reference.

Up to and including the Forty-fifth Congress the bills were all bound. Here is a copy I hold in my hand, which the members can all see, of the mode in which these bills were bound heretofore up to the date I have mentioned. Since the Forty-fifth Congress none of them have been bound, and this law imposes the duty upon the Public Printer to have them bound. There is no provision, however, for any force of employees to do the work; and this resolution simply requires and directs the employment of a man to compile them in pursuance of the law which was passed by the Fifty-third Congress. It is necessary and essential that is shall be done.

Now, a word in response to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. SAYERS. Before that, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what he has to say in reference to the appointment of Mr. Grayson independent of the regular force?

Mr. ODELL. Not for this particular service.

Mr. SAYERS. He goes to the bill room.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But that is another service altogether.

Mr. SAYERS. What other service?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It is to take care of the bills of this Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. But what has the gentleman who was appointed regularly by the majority of this House for the purpose of taking care of the bills to do, then?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why, he is employed to take care of them.

Mr. SAYERS. But there are two of them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But only one has been appointed.

Mr. SAYERS. Grayson has been appointed to assist him.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Not at all. His duty is to arrange and compile the bills of each Congress—the bills that have accumulated and piled up in all of these years; and there is nobody else to do the work. It became so pressing that the last Congress made it peremptory to have it done.

Mr. MILES. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes.

Mr. MILES. I understood you to say a while ago that Mr. C. W. Coombs, Department messenger, was appointed at the instance of this side of the House. Do you adhere to that statement?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. MILES. Was not Mr. Coombs appointed by virtue of a report made by the Committee on Accounts on January 7?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Was he not one of the four men that were accorded to your side?

Mr. MILES. No; he was appointed under a special report from the Committee on Accounts, made January 7.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What place does he fill?

Mr. MILES. He is now called special messenger. He is really doing those duties which he has done for this House since long prior to the Fifty-first Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the other side of the House, I desire to read to the gentleman what was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] in the debate which followed the introduction of the report from the Committee on Accounts. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] said:

> In the Fifty-first Congress there was a united voice for his retention—
> Referring to Mr. Coombs—
> Why? To answer that question let me go into detail. There are certain public documents put to the credit of members for distribution among their constituents: but those of us who have served in this body know that there are a large number of calls for documents constantly coming to us that are never placed to our credit; and, for one, I was baffled in meeting these requests from my district until I learned there was such an office as that of "Department messenger" filled by Colonel Coombs. Since then, when I get a request for documents outside of those put to my credit in the folding room, I refer it indorsed "Respectfully referred to C. W. Coombs, Department messenger." He will find that document if it is in this Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Has the gentleman concluded his question?

Mr. MILES. One moment. Let me read a little further:

> A MEMBER. Would not the other man do so, too?
> Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; I do not care what member of Congress was appointed to take that place it would take him years to learn to perform the duties. He goes into the archives of this Government. He knows every nook and corner where these documents are concealed and hidden, and I never felt a keener regret than when I learned he had been removed.

Now, I read these remarks simply for the purpose of showing to gentlemen on the other side that this messenger was appointed—and I am glad he was appointed, Mr. Speaker—because of a special report made to this House by the Committee on Accounts, and that the action of that committee was defended, and ably defended, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and other gentlemen on the other side of the House, and that no member on this side of the House participated in that debate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SAYERS. I want to read something to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No; not now. I will in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that while it is true that my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] spoke in a very complimentary manner of Mr. Coombs, yet, nevertheless, he belongs to the other side of the House and is retained, partly out of courtesy to that side of the House and partly owing to the fact that he is an efficient, competent man and discharges his duties with the greatest fidelity and satisfaction.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman permit me for one moment?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If it is on this matter.

Mr. MILES. Were we not at the organization of this House conceded four men for this side of the House?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes.

Mr. MILES. In addition to Mr. Coombs. And were not those four men given to us as this courtesy to which you refer long before the appointment of Mr. Coombs, who was at first removed from office by the other side and afterwards named as special messenger by a report from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then you disclaim all interest in Mr. Coombs, do you?

Mr. MILES. No; on the contrary, I claim that same interest in Mr. Coombs which every other member of this House must feel because of his efficiency, and we have the testimony of your side of the House that you can not fill his place by any new man.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, if you will give us time we will try to. I regard him as a very efficient man, but I am sorry indeed to have it thrown in our face that we are expending public money in retaining men who were put into office by that side of the House. I do not think we ought to endure that charge, and I think we ought to be relieved of it, and we will see if it is possible to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] desires to ask me a question I will yield to him.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to a clause in the urgent deficiency bill which passed this House about the 21st of this month. The clause is:

To pay to Joel Grayson, for services in the document room, from January 1 to June 30, 1896, inclusive, at $125 per month, $750.

Now, Joel Grayson will be employed, if this bill becomes a law, in addition to the regular appointee on the force of the House, so that in place of one man you have two men there.

Now, why can not the regular appointee, Mr. Grayson, perform the duties suggested by this resolution?

Mr. ODELL. Because it would be impossible.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Grayson's name was inserted in the resolution by the Committee on Accounts because he has been in the service of the House for several years; he is a very efficient man, he performs a special work, and this work will require a man to give it his whole time and attention. It is nothing to me one way or another. The Committee on Accounts, who have investigated the matter, have reported it as a necessity, and it does seem to me that they ought to know what they are about. That committee is not noted, Mr. Speaker, for recommending resolutions for employees of this House very numerously. This is one of the instances in which they report for the employment of an extra man out of the many resolutions that have been sent to them by members.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say one word in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. When this whole matter is simmered down to the bottom facts it is discovered that there are only six men on the rolls of this House who are not on the rolls of the last House, and they are extra clerks to committees—made necessary in the judgment of the chairmen of those committees—assistant clerks, one each to the Committees on Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, and Interstate and Foreign Commerce, at $6 per day. That is three clerks. They were employed by resolution of the House, at the request of the chairmen of those committees. The other extra man was a press-gallery messenger, employed at the instance of the press gallery, reported favorably upon by the Committee on Accounts. The other two are assistant clerks to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not know of any persons more competent to judge of the necessity for extra employees than the House itself, on the recommendation of the chairmen of those committees. Not one man has been put upon the rolls of this House more than were on the rolls of the last House except as additional clerks to committees. This matter is entirely separate and distinct from all of those others, and grows out of the accumulation for years of these unbound bills.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention not so much to the specific proposition under discussion as to the general proposition asserted here that this House has increased the force. I call attention to the debate that occurred on February 8, in the last Congress, last February, where it appears that the House then, against the protest of large numbers on this side, reduced the force of clerks to the number of nine: and while those gentlemen are talking about an increase of clerks, we are merely getting back to what the last House had. I desire to ask the attention especially of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. The legislative bill was under discussion, and this occurred:

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill how many less clerks are provided for committees than heretofore.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is impossible to hear what is going on, on account of the confusion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that there is not order in the House.

Mr. PICKLER (reading):

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill how many less clerks are provided for committees than heretofore.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are 9 less, including 5 assistant clerks. They are usually provided for by resolution at the first session of each Congress.

Mr. PICKLER. How many less does the gentleman say are provided for?

Mr. DOCKERY. Nine less.

Mr. DINGLEY. The annual clerks are just the same. In the paragraph following the reduction of session clerks is made.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to say that the annual clerks which are provided for in this bill are precisely as they stand in the current law. There has been an application made to the Committee on Appropriations to give an annual clerk to the Committee on Banking and Currency. but the committee did not feel authorized to make any recommendation for that, the House not having acted upon it. Therefore the annual clerks stand precisely as in the current law. There is a reduction in the next paragraph in the number of session clerks—5 clerks and 4 assistant clerks.

"For 14 clerks to committees, at $6 each per day during the session, $17,808."

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, as I understand the gentleman in charge of the bill, there are 8 less assistant per diem clerks provided for here.

Mr. DINGLEY. Nine less.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nine less are provided for under this paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. Are these the clerks that heretofore have been used as assistant clerks to committees?

Mr. DOCKERY. They are usually provided for by resolution, to be paid out of the contingent fund, at the first session of each Congress. When it desires to furnish the committees with additional assistance Congress passes a resolution providing for their payment out of the contingent fund; and then at the second session the salaries for those assistant clerks to committees are provided for in the legislative bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, if this reduction is made, it will take away that many assistants from these committees.

Mr. DOCKERY. It does for the time. But the practice is that each Congress determines for itself what number of assistant clerks it desires.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, when members were provided with individual clerks, quite a large number of these committees were deprived of clerks. It was considered that the member's clerk could take care of them.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right; and instead of these 9 assistants we give 9 additional clerks to members.

Mr. PICKLER. I think the members ought to have annual clerks, just like the Senate.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is not the issue here.

Mr. PICKLER. But we might adopt that issue. There are a number of these committees that can not get along without clerks, and it is a saving to the Government for a member of a committee to have an individual clerk. The Agricultural Department has lessened its expense quite largely, as I understand, because members are now provided with clerks, and that Department is not required to do the work that they had done heretofore.

Mr. DOCKERY. We have simply provided for 14 clerks to the committees, and that does not interfere at all with the annual clerkships.

Mr. PICKLER. I am interested in this. Being a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I know we need clerical assistance. My point is, whether in the next Congress members will have to get along without that assistance.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is left for each Congress to determine what clerical assistance it wants.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not understand—it may be my inability—where this reduction is to be made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will illustrate: Suppose, which is not altogether unlikely, that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] should be chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the next House. He would doubtless offer a resolution providing that the committee be allowed one or two additional clerks, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. That resolution would be reported by the Committee on Accounts and would doubtless be agreed to, as such resolutions generally are, and the committee would have its assistant clerks, as it has had in the past.

Mr. PICKLER. But why should we not provide on this bill now for annual clerks for members and be done with it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Because the custom has always been to allow each House to determine for itself what additional clerical service it needs.

The point is, gentlemen, that these nine assistants were cut off that had been provided in the legislative appropriation bills heretofore. This is a new departure; and as shown in this debate, this committee cut off nine of these assistants; and the gentleman from Missouri in charge of the bill assured us, of course, that we would be allowed these clerks, as we supposed, without controversy in this House. Now, so far as the Committee on Invalid Pensions is concerned, we are only back to where all other Congresses have been with the addition of one assistant; and there are not two additional assistants to that committee. I merely desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this whole proposition that this House was largely increasing the force of clerks is not true. We are simply getting back to the point where former Congresses were, before they cut off these nine assistants, as shown in this debate at the end of their Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply desire to say that the gentleman is entirely correct, and I stand by every word of the RECORD.

Mr. PICKLER. I just stated what the gentleman from Missouri has said, and he ought to coincide with us.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to state that a practice prevails in the Senate now of binding all these bills, as contemplated by this resolution. It is their uniform practice; they have kept it up in all preceding Congresses, and they are doing it by the use of their present clerical force, as I am informed. I think these bills ought to be bound. I agree that they ought to be bound. It is a valuable volume, and it ought to be preserved; and the only way it can be preserved is by having the bills bound.

They will get lost if left separate; but I do not think we ought to lay the necessity for this work upon the Printing Bureau. We ought simply to say that these documents ought to be bound and that we will pass a resolution authorizing the Public Printer to bind them, and that, if it is necessary to have additional force for that purpose, we will authorize it. The employment need only be temporary, for, in my opinion, the handling of those bills in preparing them for the printer ought not to take more than a month or six weeks. They ought to be arranged and bound in that time, and when the work is done they will be found a valuable contribution to our collection of documents.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, the substitute I have reported provides that this employee shall be employed only for such time as is necessary to perform the work.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in reply to the remarks submitted by my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON], who, I believe, had the honor to be chairman of the Printing Committee in the last Congress. I insist that it is the work of the Joint Committee on Printing which makes necessary the appointment of this additional employee. My colleague takes the position that the printing bill, so called, does not require that the bills of the Congresses from the Forty-fifth up to the present shall be bound. In reply to that I desire to read a provision contained in that bill:

That the Public Printer shall bind four sets of Senate and House of Representatives bills, joint and concurrent resolutions of each Congress, two for the Senate and two for the House, to be furnished him from the files of the Senate and the House document rooms, the volumes when bound to be kept there, etc.

Now, that means that all of these bills that have not already been bound shall be bound, or it means nothing; and if it is contemplated by the provision I have read that these bills shall be bound, then somebody must be employed to prepare them for binding.

Through an investigation made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Accounts it has been ascertained that there is no man in the document room who can give his time and attention to assorting and preparing for the printer the bills that have accumulated from the Forty-fifth Congress down to the present time. Hence this resolution has been reported to the House in this modified form. While I have been and am persistently opposed to the creation of additional offices unless they are absolutely necessary for the conduct of the public business, I have felt constrained by the report of this Subcommittee on Accounts to believe that this office is necessary and that without it this work can not be done. I want to repeat, in conclusion, what I said a while ago to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], that I am informed that the rolls of this House carry fewer employees than were carried during the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and the substitute.

The question being taken on the demand for the previous question, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ODELL. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 84, noes 33; so the substitute was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was adopted was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask for the correction of the references of four bills, erroneously referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which should have gone to the Committee on Appropriations. They are House bills Nos. 4691, 3197, 4403, and 3228.

The SPEAKER (after examining the bills). Three of these are public bills and one is a private bill, as to which the correction should be made under the rules. Without objection, the other corrections will be made as requested.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO THE COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the persons to employ whom authority was given the Committee on Invalid Pensions by resolution of the House adopted January 23, 1896, one an experienced typewriter and stenographer, the other experienced in the examination of pension cases, laws, and reports, and capable of reporting intelligently thereon to the committee; be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, the only object of this resolution is to supplement the one already passed, authorizing this employment, by correcting an error that was inadvertently made in that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is this intended to repeal the former resolution, or as a substitute for it?

Mr. TRACEY. It is not intended to repeal the original resolution, but simply to correct it in one particular. The original resolution failed to indicate a source from which the pay of these employees was to come, and this resolution provides that it shall come from the contingent fund of the House, as was originally intended, though, by inadvertence, that provision was not embodied in the original resolution.

Mr. PICKLER. This is intended to correct a mere clerical error.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some explanation from the gentleman presenting this report.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to make an explanation. The original resolution as presented by the Committee on Accounts contained all that is contained in this resolution, with a single exception. One clause was inadvertently omitted from the original, the words "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House," and this is simply intended to supply that omission.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution how many clerks the Committee on Invalid Pensions will be provided with if this resolution shall pass?

Mr. TRACEY. No additional clerks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How many will it have altogether?

Mr. PICKLER. One clerk and three assistants.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That committee has four clerks, then?

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Some committees of the House do not have any clerk.

Mr. TRACEY. The proposition to allow the Committee on Invalid Pensions these clerks has already been adopted by the House, and this resolution is merely intended to provide for their compensation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How many members of that committee are there?

Mr. PICKLER. Fifteen.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then each member has his own private clerk and part of another.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to have anything to say about this matter. The resolution which the House adopted the other day providing for two assistant clerks for the Committee on Invalid Pensions omitted to provide from what fund those clerks should be paid. This resolution simply provides that they shall be paid from the contingent fund. That is all there is in it.

In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I wish to say that in previous Congresses the Committee on Invalid Pensions has had one clerk and two assistants. At this session we have a large increase of business. When the resolution to which I have just referred was, upon the unanimous request of our committee, introduced and referred to the Committee on Accounts, that committee would not act upon it favorably until they had appointed a subcommittee of three members to investigate the matter and to confer with our clerks. That investigation having been made, the subcommittee realized the large amount of business before our committee, and taking into consideration also the urgent requests of large numbers of members for the consideration of bills in which they felt particular interest, reported favorably to the full Committee on Accounts, by whom the resolution was unanimously recommended to the House. It simply provides one assistant clerk in addition to the number this committee has had in previous Congresses; and I will say that I doubt whether our committee, even with this assistance, will be able to give proper attention to the mass of business coming before it. But I trust that we shall.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not make any complaint about the number of clerks given to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but I want occasionally to point out to the House the extreme fairness of the Committee on Accounts, a committee that gives five or six committee clerks to the State of the chairman and provides especially for the Committee on Militia, but refuses, for the first time in many years, to allow to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, although the only chairmanship given to the State which I in part represent—the Committee on Accounts refuses to give us a committee clerk or anything else to run the committee with. That is all I desire to say.

The question being taken on the resolution, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TRACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES.

Mr. PAYNE. I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to present the resolution which I send to the desk and to ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be authorized to have printed and bound such documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. MILES. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether this committee has had this authority heretofore?

Mr. PAYNE. The committee has had such authority in some former Congresses. I am not able to state whether it has had it uniformly or not. But I will say to the gentleman that our committee has had a number of important hearings, and it seems to be necessary that a report of those hearings should be printed for the use of members of the committee and for the information of the House.

Mr. MILES. What extra cost will this entail?

Mr. PAYNE. I am not able to state what the extra cost will be. It will not be very large.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, and it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HITT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will permit me, before that motion is made, to offer a resolution. It is a matter that is very important.

Mr. HITT. Do I understand that this will take but a moment?

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

Mr. HITT. Is it a resolution for an assistant clerk?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That an assistant clerk be allowed the Committee on Claims during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress, at a compensation of $6 per day, to be paid from January 1, 1896, out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. This should go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will not object.

Mr. DINGLEY. The matter ought to be inquired into by the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] objects.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill. There may be some brief explanation necessary, and after that we can proceed to consider the bill in detail by paragraphs.

It is substantially a reenactment of the existing law, there being some variations.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois to dispense with the first reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I will now inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] as to whether his side of the House requires time, or can we agree on the limit for general debate?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill is almost exactly the same as the bill passed last year, with a few necessary additions, and, as at present informed, I do not think we wish any general debate on this side.

Mr. HITT. Then I move to limit all general debate on the bill to ten minutes. I will occupy that time in explaining the provisions of the bill, after which we will proceed to consider it by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing the general debate in ten minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates the money to pay the persons employed in the diplomatic and consular service of the United States, and to meet other necessities of that service, all of which are contemplated by statutes now in force.

The change from the expenditures now authorized by law for the current year ending June 30, 1896, amount to an increase of about $58,000. This increase is largely apparent, however, rather than real. For example, there is an amount of $16,500 which is simply to provide compensation in salaries for consuls in nine places where fees have heretofore been allowed; and while there is an apparent increase to that extent, as a matter of fact the payment of these officers by salaries instead of fees is a reduction of expense rather than an increase. It lessens the charge upon the Treasury, as the salaries amount to less than the fees. There is also a provision for an additional secretary of legation in the city of Mexico, owing to the largely increased business with that country and the importance of the mission, as well as the propriety of putting it on a par with other missions of a similar grade, but which are not in fact so important as this one.

There is an increase of $10,000 in the allowance for chargés d'affaires ad interim, raised from $20,000 to $30,000. That provision is simply a frank and truthful way of meeting the necessary expenses required by existing law instead of not providing adequately for them in time, and afterwards when it is found that not enough has been allowed leaving the matter to the Committee on Appropriations to be put into the deficiency bill, as has been the custom for some years past. The expenditure in this case is determined by the necessities of the service and by the existing law. During the years 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894 the deficiency appropriation bill carried a provision for this service, not always of the same amount, but ranging from $2,000 to about $13,000. In only one year, 1892, has this expenditure risen above the sum of $30,000; and we thought it, therefore, reasonable to allow that sum, out of which the amount necessary will be expended, and if more shall be required then they can call on the Committee on Appropriations, as has been done heretofore, to make it up in a deficiency bill.

There is a provision for the payment of $4,000 rent for the legation building at Tokyo, Japan. This is a possible rather than a real expenditure, as it will be remembered that a bill passed the House a few days ago, and will probably pass the Senate—an urgent deficiency bill—providing for the purchase of a legation at Tokyo for $16,000; and if that bill shall become a law, and the legation building is purchased, it will leave only a ground rent of about $200 per annum to be paid instead of $4,000. So that appropriation, while it is $4,000 in terms, will probably prove to be only $200 in fact.

There is a slight increase in the appropriation for the enforcement of the neutrality laws provided for by section 291 of the Revised Statutes, and $15,000 for the completion and publication of the Intercontinental Railway Commission's reports. We have already spent vast sums in that project. The surveys have been practically completed along the route proposed through these different countries, from Mexico to Bolivia, by the three surveying parties; the reports are all here. We have already expended on them $25,000, that being the last appropriation for this purpose, which completed about two-thirds of the reports. The cost of the survey has amounted to an enormous sum, and in order to make that valuable work available to engineers, projectors, investors, and others who desire to look into the matter we propose to print the entire work and make it accessible to our people.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What has been done with the publications that have been completed up to this time?

Mr. HITT. They are given out by the Commission in charge of the work to those specially interested. Whenever a member of Congress writes for one of these books, for a specific purpose, I think it will be always sent to him; but it is not granted to a man who sends for a copy for a constituent, in the ordinary way in which documents are scattered about; because this is a technical and very expensive work and should be paid for by those interested in it. If the gentleman has a half hour that he desires to spend pleasantly, I do not know that he can spend it to better advantage than by going into the Commission quarters in the building at the corner of Fourteenth street and New York avenue and examining the splendid work that is going on there.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Can any member of Congress secure a copy?

Mr. HITT. Any member will be able to secure a copy when it is all out, I have no doubt, and more than one copy. In fact, there is no strict and specific limit upon the way they are given out, except that inasmuch as the work has been so costly and there has been such a vast labor in its preparation, care is used in distributing copies, so that they shall not be thrown away.

There is a small sum of $400 to carry out our obligations in consequence of an international agreement for a bureau to repress the slave trade.

Three thousand dollars is given to establish a consulate in the far interior of China, at a place called Chung King. There are many missionaries there, and they have been greatly exposed. We have had to resort to British protection and force for the safety of American life in that quarter, and at the recommendation of the State Department the committee have inserted this consulate.

There is a change of another consulate from Ningpo to Chefoo, because Chefoo is a far more suitable place for the office of the consul.

A number of consulates which are now paid by fees, and which under a statute of the United States of July 16, 1892, are required to be reported to the House by the Secretary of State and estimated for as salaried, that they may be changed to salaried posts, if deemed wise, have been reported in this bill, but in every case where the change has been made, except Hull, the fees that are now being paid to the consul are greater than the salary that is allowed him in the bill, so that there is no charge on the Treasury by this change, and it is not an increase of expenditure, save in one, the case of Hull. They are as follows:

France:
Limoges, commercial agent, fees in 1894, $1,664.50; to be salaried at	$1,500
Germany:
Freiburg, commercial agent, fees in 1894, $1,737.50; to be salaried at	1,500
Glauchau, commercial agent, fees in 1894, $2,808.25; to be salaried at	2,000
Weimar, commercial agent, fees in 1894, $2,382.50; to be salaried at	2,000
Great Britain:
Hull, consul, fees in 1894, $951.09; to be salaried at	1,500
St. Johns, Newfoundland, consul, fees in 1894, $1,569.20; to be salaried at	1,500
Swansea, commercial agent, fees in 1894, $4,676; to be salaried at	2,500
Trinidad, consul, fees in 1894, $2,269.13; to be salaried at	2,000
Netherlands:
Curaçoa, consul, fees in 1894, $2,445.60; to be salaried at	2,000
Total	16,500

The total amount of the salaries of the officers thus changed from feed to salaried offices is $16,500, and this bill is increased by that amount, whereas the fees to be accounted hereafter to the Treasury amount to $29,503.77.

In the case of Hull alone the salary proposed, $1,500, is larger than the amount of fees collected, $951.09.

For years past the Department has submitted this estimate and urged the change at that post to enable a worthy man to live there and remove him from the line of trade. It is one of the great refitting seaports of England, largely resorted to by American vessels. Experience has shown that there is serious need of this change at Hull. A feed consul at that post is under our laws authorized to engage in trade, and the most profitable trade there is in supplying materials for refitting ships or boarding or relieving destitute American seamen. There is, therefore, an inducement to him to associate himself with persons engaged in those lines of trade. By the shipping act fees for services required by masters and seamen are no longer paid by the vessel or the seamen, but by the Government, and it is plainly the interest of the consul to have vouchers in the largest amounts possible. This office ought to be salaried.

We have not given the $2,500 recommended by the Department, but have given $1,500.

The salary at Barbados, a place which has of late been much frequented by our countrymen, has been increased $500, on account of the importance of its trade, and on account of the fact that it is a resort for our ships and citizens.

At Sonneberg, the amount appropriated for clerk hire has been found insufficient. It is necessary, in a consulate of such large, varied, and important business, where there are 5,000 invoices every year, that a larger sum should be allowed, and there has been an increase of $200 in that item.

There are specific appropriations for a large number of consulates enumerated in the bill, giving each an allowance for clerk hire. This bill always grants a lump sum at the end of those items, to be distributed by the Department to such posts in the great body of the consulates as are not specifically provided for. That sum was $20,000. It has been found insufficient, so we have raised it to $25,000. The $20,000 heretofore allowed has been distributed among 43 posts in the whole service, which leaves 193 consulates unprovided for. With this $5,000 additional 30 of the most important posts can be provided with clerk hire.

We have also provided for a jail and a jailer at Madagascar, where there has been trouble and expense for want of such provision.

These are the changes in this appropriation bill, as compared with that of last year. There is a single item which touches more general legislation. The trust funds in the custody of the State Department have heretofore, by the officer having them in charge, been deposited where he pleased, deposited generally in banks. The Secretary of State has suggested, and the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department of the House of Representatives have presented to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the draft of an amendment to the existing law. By it we have provided that these funds shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury and paid out on certificates of the Secretary of State; a reform which I think will meet the approval of every member of the House.

I have no further explanations to offer.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], the chairman of the committee, is so full and so correct that I can add but very little to it. The members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in preparing the appropriation bill this year were entirely unanimous. There was no disagreement whatever among them either in the subcommittee that prepared the bill or in the full committee, and I am gratified that we were able to be so harmonious.

This bill appropriates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, the sum of $1,637,058.76. The appropriation bill of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, the present year, amounted to $1,538,458.76. There is a net increase in this bill of $98,600.

Mr. HITT. If the gentleman will permit me, Mr. Chairman, there is one erroneous addition, which makes the footing wrong.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am reading from the report presented by the chairman, which accompanies the bill.

Mr. HITT. The report is not quite correct in its addition. There are two consulates by mistake put into the total of $1,637,000, and the amount, if correctly stated, would be $1,630,000.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I was reading from the report. The amount of increase is, as stated by the chairman of the committee, about $90,000.

Mr. HITT. About $90,000—some of it only apparent increase of expenditure.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Ninety thousand dollars. I only wish to say that this increase, Mr. Chairman, is made necessary by the addition to last year's appropriation bill which the Committee on Foreign Affairs believes is necessary. To illustrate, as is well known by the older members of the House, we have been making appropriations for the intercontinental railway survey and for the publication of the reports connected with it. We found that $15,000 additional was necessary to complete the valuable reports, maps, etc., connected with it. We also found that under the act of July 16, 1892, which requires the estimates to include the salaries for the higher feed consular offices, that we would be compelled under the law to put in a number of consulates which were heretofore known as feed consulates and to make them salaried consulates, which has added $16,500 to the bill. I believe that every change in the bill, and there are but few changes, is absolutely necessary; and I hope the bill will pass as reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Time for general debate is closed.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will pardon me for a moment, before debate is closed. I understand him to say that the increase over last year is $90,000.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. About $90,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that all of these increases he regarded as necessary for the public service?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has been closed and the bill will be read by sections.

Mr. DOCKERY. The first paragraph can be read, and then I will move to strike out the last word.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, severally appropriated, in full compensation for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of submitting an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. I notice in the report of the Auditor of the State and other Departments for the last fiscal year a recommendation found on page 4. The Auditor says:

Among the appropriations for the Department of State is one for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries. I respectfully recommend that this appropriation be made in the future to apply to American seamen who may be shipwrecked on the coast of Alaska. Most of that territory is remote from other parts of the United States, and it has a very extensive and sparsely settled coast line, with few ports, but little local shipping, and only rare opportunities are offered seamen to reship. Claims have frequently been presented from Alaska for the relief and transportation of seamen, wherein it was a peculiar hardship to the claimants not to be reimbursed the expenses, but there has been no appropriation available for that purpose.

Mr. HITT. On what page is that?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is on page 4 of the report of the Auditor of the State and other Departments.

Now, then, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of that recommendation, and in view of the further fact that it has been specially called to my attention by officials connected with that Bureau, whether or not the Committee on Foreign Affairs has given that recommendation any consideration in the preparation of this bill?

Mr. HITT. It has not; but there is a provision referred to by the Auditor, which is found on page 25 of the bill in hand, appropriating $50,000 for the relief and protection of American seamen; and if the gentleman from Missouri will move an amendment to include those shipwrecked on the coast of Alaska, that will cover the point exactly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, as I am compelled to be absent from the Hall in connection with business pending before the Committee on Appropriations, I will leave an amendment with the chairman of the committee, and if in his judgment it is wise I will be glad if he will offer it when that point is reached in the consideration of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, $426,000, as follows, namely.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "six," in line 6, and insert "one." That computation is not correct. It should be $421,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls at Nagasaki, Osaka, and Hiogo.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, line 16 is not punctuated correctly. There are but two posts. One is at Nagasaki and the other is a joint post at Osaka and Hiogo. The comma should be stricken out after the word Nagasaki and the word "and" inserted, and the comma should be stricken out after the word "Osaka."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consul at Ningpo.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, in line 10 there is a misprint in the bill. It should be Chefoo instead of Ningpo.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls at Rotterdam and Curao a.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call attention of the chairman to the twelfth line on page 17, where there is a misprint.

Mr. HITT. The letter "ç" is omitted in "Curaçoa."

The CHAIRMAN. The correction will be made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of relieving the Clerk a moment, and I also desire, in this connection, to return my thanks to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the very wise administrative provision in relation to trust funds found on page 11. This will relieve a very embarrassing situation in the Department of State, which has caused some loss to the Government. Having had some knowledge of the question, I again desire to recognize the wisdom of the committee in reporting this provision, and especially are we indebted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

Relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $50,000.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this paragraph by inserting after the word "countries," in line 11, the words "and also on the coast of Alaska."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commercial Bureau of American Republics, $28,000: Provided, That any moneys received from sale of the Bureau publications, from rents, or other sources may be paid into the Treasury as a credit in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Bureau.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to the provision that "any moneys received from sale of the Bureau publications, from rents, or other sources, may be paid into the Treasury," etc. Should not the word "may" be "shall"?

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the Director of this Bureau explained this matter very fully to the committee last year, and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] drew the paragraph then in the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The provision as it stands is simply permissive.

Mr. HITT. It is. The object was to avoid locking up these funds in the Treasury so that they could not be drawn upon for necessary expenses of the Bureau without waiting for an appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. But, as a matter of protection to the Treasury, should not all receipts from the sale of these publications, rents, etc., be paid into the Treasury? Without such a provision what protection is there for the Government?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the provision to which the gentleman calls attention was inserted in the bill at the last session of Congress. At that time there were some special expenses which caused us to use the word "may." No previous appropriation bill had contained just such a provision.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can understand how the word "may" in the phrase "may be drawn" is unobjectionable, but in the second line I think the word "may" should be "shall," so that the clause will read, "shall be paid."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I see no objection to the change which the gentleman suggests being made in the second line, but I think the word "may" should stand in the third line.

Mr. DINGLEY. I see no objection to that.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I think the objection made by the Director of the Bureau to being required to pay all moneys into the Treasury was that there were current expenditures as well as current receipts; he was selling documents and making certain necessary expenditures, and what he desired was to be permitted to keep an account, and to pay the balance into the Treasury at stated times, instead of paying in all his receipts.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make this suggestion because it is in line with the policy pursued in all of our appropriation bills to require that incidental receipts of this character shall all be paid into the Treasury, and then if money is required for expenses that it shall be drawn from the Treasury. Without some such provision there can be no protection for the Government in this respect. With the permission of the gentleman in charge of the bill, I will move that the word "may" in line 2, in the phrase "may be paid," be stricken out and the word "shall" substituted.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I see there is an appropriation of $28,000 made here for the International Bureau of American Republics. I would like to inquire what that Bureau is doing and what becomes of its publications. Are they available for free public distribution?

Mr. HITT. The Bureau of American Republics is a bureau in this city which is constantly collecting information, and in doing so it is compelled to expend a good deal of money. Its publications are sold. A limited number of them are distributed gratuitously, but the gratis list is much smaller than it was formerly. The price of the publications, however, is down to cost.

Mr. DOLLIVER. On what basis are these publications distributed free to the public?

Mr. HITT. They are not distributed free. The greater part of them are not suitable for distribution to the general reader or of interest as general literature. They are largely technical and are intended for merchants who are willing to pay for them and who do pay for them. By the sale of these publications the Bureau itself supplies the greater part of the money that is required to maintain it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I may add, Mr. Chairman, that this Bureau was agreed upon when the Pan-American Congress was in session, and under the arrangement then made all the countries south of our own, including Mexico, the Republics of Central America and of South America, except, I believe, Chile, all agreed to pay a certain portion of the expense, and we make this appropriation in accordance with that agreement.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would like to ask also, while I am up, what becomes of these consular reports? I have heard complaint that when requests are made for them for distribution they are no longer in print.

Mr. HITT. They are not sent, as of course, to all members; but on application by a member he receives a certain number, I think 13. Some of us do not seem to get any.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have never had any difficulty in getting them upon making application at the State Department.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Is that true also of the publications of the Bureau of American Republics?

Mr. HITT. No; you can get them in limited numbers, on application, or in numbers not strictly limited for any specific purpose, for instance, where the persons desiring them are pursuing some special study, or discharging a special public duty.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Or for libraries?

Mr. HITT. I think so. But they are not sent free to merchants, because the merchant wants them to make money out of them and he ought to pay for them and does pay for them cheerfully.

A MEMBER. They are also distributed free to the press.

Mr. HITT. I think so.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROSVENOR, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the amendments, though numerous, are generally unimportant, and I ask consent that a vote be taken upon them all at once.

There was no objection. The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECONVENING OF DELEGATES TO MARINE CONFERENCE OF 1889.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1450) to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference of 1889. This bill has been favorably considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the Washington International Marine Conference of 1889, whenever in his judgment it is expedient, for the further consideration of rules to prevent collisions at sea and in the waters of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for necessary expenses incurred under this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress a detailed statement of expenditures incurred under this act.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending the request for unanimous consent, I trust I may be allowed to state that the bill just read is identical with House bill No. 3827, which was favorably reported some days ago by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The Senate bill was reported by that committee this morning, and the report upon the Senate bill refers to the report previously made on the House bill. As the latter report is brief, I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. PAYNE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3827) entitled "A bill to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference of 1889," having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

Chapter 593, of the laws of 1888, creating the International Marine Conference, provided that the powers and authority conferred on the delegates of the United States should terminate on January 1, 1890. This bill bestows upon the Secretary of State the power to reconvene the seven American delegates at a cost not exceeding $2,000, if public interests render such a meeting desirable.

Such a meeting will probably prove desirable during the spring or early summer for two reasons:

First. In 1894 an understanding was reached by the principal maritime powers that the revised international rules to prevent collisions at sea (the chief work of the International Marine Conference at Washington) should go into effect on March 1, 1895. This understanding was broken by a change of position by the British Government, which in January, 1895, notified the United States that until Parliament had been consulted it could not agree to the date fixed. Several other nations also withdrew their assents, and by act of Congress (February 23, 1895) the date was postponed. In the interval Germany had suggested tentatively a few changes in the proposed Washington rules. It is expected that the final views of the British Government as fixed by Parliament, which meets in February, will be received in March or April. The question whether changes, if any are proposed, should be accepted or rejected should first be presented to those who represented the United States at the conference and acted for this country in framing the proposed rules before being submitted to Congress. This result can be most expeditiously and satisfactorily achieved by granting authority, which does not now exist, to reconvene the delegates of the United States to examine and report on such matters as may be submitted to them.

Second. It is also desirable that these delegates consider the report upon measures to bring our inland and harbor rules into closer accord with the international rules when the form of the latter becomes finally determined.

This matter is a very important one, as the report of the conference which was adopted as above stated covered all the rules and regulations for the safety of lives and property carried by vessels navigating the high seas. There is no doubt but that the result of the work of the commission was a great advance over the rules now in force. Whatever amendments are now proposed should be submitted promptly to the able experts who were the delegates of the United States to the conference, and who are familiar with the work of the conference, and are able to give to Congress promptly reliable information upon any amendments which may be offered by any other Government. Congress should respond quickly and intelligently to any proposed change in the rules of the conference, in order that the new rules may go into force as speedily as possible.

The bill limits the cost to $2,000, and appropriates that sum, or so much of it as may be necessary. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House bill No. 3827, identical in its provisions with the Senate bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

EDUCATION OF DEAF MUTES.

Mr. GROW. I ask consent to have read, without printing in the RECORD, what I send to the Clerk's desk. I wish it read for the information of the House.

There was no objection; and the Clerk read a bill to aid in establishing homes in the States and Territories for teaching articulate speech and vocal language to deaf children before they are of school age.

Mr. GROW. Before this bill is referred, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement which will occupy perhaps a minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, thanking the House for its indulgence, I wish to state my only reason for departing from the regular course in the presentation of this bill. This measure, it will be observed, has reference to a new system of education, first started by Mary S. Garrett, the lady named in the bill as principal of the school referred to—a system by which children born deaf are, through the aid of the eye, taught to speak in the same way as if they could hear. This lady insists that there is no child born deaf (unless it be a perfect imbecile) that has not the vocal organs as all other children have, and that deaf children can be taught in infancy, through the aid of the eye, to speak just as well as those who hear. This she has demonstrated in her school and by public exhibitions at the World's Fair in Chicago, and also at the Atlanta Exposition. In these exhibitions she has shown that children born deaf can, by proper education, be brought to converse so well that the person conversing with them would not know of their deafness. According to this lady's statistics, about one child in every fifteen hundred is born deaf. She insists that if the mothers of deaf children would talk to them in the same way as if they could hear, those children would grow up to speak the same as other children.

I have taken this method of calling the attention of the House to this matter before it comes up regularly for consideration. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education.

There being no objection, the bill H. R. 4990 was read twice, referred to the Committee on Education, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF HON. FREDERICK REMANN.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to convey to this House in an official way intelligence of the death of my predecessor, the Hon. Frederick Remann, a Representative-elect from the State of Illinois. His death occurred at his home in Vandalia on the 14th of July of last year. I shall detain the House at this time with only a single word of tribute. Born and reared in the county which was his home at the time of his death, he had the esteem of everyone who knew him, and was most highly esteemed by those who knew him best. Frequently called to fill important public positions in his neighborhood and State, he always brought to the discharge of his duties a wonderful fidelity to the interests of those he undertook to serve. At the early age of 17 he enlisted as a private in the Union Army and served his country gallantly. In 1894 he was elected to a membership in this House by a majority both flattering to himself and creditable to the people of his district, who by his untimely death have been deprived of his valuable services. In a word, he was a good soldier, a steadfast friend, a public-spirited and patriotic citizen, and a beloved husband and father.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Frederick Remann, late a member-elect of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back a number of petitions on the subject of recognizing the belligerent rights of Cuba; also, a joint resolution offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], Senate joint resolution 4, declaring that a state of public war exists in Cuba, and that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban government.

I report back as a substitute two resolutions, which I will read, accompanied by a written report. The report is brief, and explains the attitude of the committee toward these questions. I will read it:

> The Congress of the United States, deeply regretting the unhappy state of hostilities existing in Cuba, which has again been the result of the demand of a large number of the native population of that island for its independence, in a spirit of respect and regard for the welfare of both countries, earnestly desires that the security of life and property and the establishment of permanent peace and of a government that is satisfactory to the people of Cuba should be accomplished.
> And to the extent that the people of Cuba are seeking the rights of local self-government for domestic purposes, the Congress of the United States expresses its earnest sympathy with them. The Congress would also welcome with satisfaction the concession by Spain of complete sovereignty to the people of that island, and would cheerfully give to such a voluntary concession the cordial support of the United States. The near proximity of Cuba to the frontier of the United States, and the fact that it is universally regarded as a part of the continental system of America, identifies that island so closely with the political and commercial welfare of our people that Congress can not be indifferent to the fact that civil war is flagrant among the people of Cuba.
> Nor can we longer overlook the fact that the destructive character of this war is doing serious harm to the rights and interests of our people on the island, and to our lawful commerce, the protection and freedom of which is safeguarded by treaty obligations. In the recent past and in former years, when internal wars have been waged for long periods and with results that were disastrous to Cuba and injurious to Spain, the Government of the United States has always observed, with perfect faith, all of its duties toward the belligerents.
> It was a difficult task thus forced upon the United States, but it was performed with vigor, impartiality, and justice, in the hope that Spain would so ameliorate the condition of the Cuban people as to give them peace, contentment, and prosperity. This desirable result has not been accomplished. Its failure has not resulted from any interference on the part of our people or Government with the people or government of Cuba.
> The hospitality which our treaties, the laws of nations, and the laws of Christianity have extended to Cuban refugees in the United States has caused distrust on the part of the Spanish Government as to the fidelity of our Government to its obligations of neutrality in the frequent insurrections of the people of Cuba against Spanish authority. This distrust has often become a source of serious annoyance to our people, and has led to a spirit of retaliation toward Spanish authority in Cuba, thus giving rise to frequent controversies between the two countries. The absence of responsible government in Cuba, with powers adequate to deal directly with questions between the people of the United States and the people and political authorities of the island, has been a frequently recurring cause of delay, protracted imprisonment, confiscations of property, and the detention of our people and their ships, often upon groundless charges, which has been a serious grievance.
> When insurrections have occurred on the Island of Cuba the temptation to unlawful invasion by reckless persons has given to our Government anxiety, trouble, and much expense in the enforcement of our laws and treaty obligations of neutrality, and these occasions have been so frequent as to make these duties unreasonably onerous upon the Government of the United States.

The devastation of Cuba in the war that is now being waged, both with fire and sword, is an anxious and disturbing cause of unrest among the people of the United States, which creates strong grounds of protests against the continuance of the struggle for power between Cuba and Spain, which is rapidly changing the issue to one of existence on the part of a great number of the native population.

It is neither just to the relations that exist between Cuba and the United States, nor is it in keeping with the spirit of the age or the rights of humanity that this struggle should be protracted until one party or the other should become exhausted in the resources of men and money, thereby weakening both until they may fall a prey to some stronger power, or until the stress of human sympathy or the resentments engendered by long and bloody conflict should draw into the strife the unruly elements of neighboring countries.

This civil war, though it is great in its proportions, and is conducted by armies that are in complete organization and directed and controlled by supreme military authority, has not the safeguard of a cartel for the treatment of wounded soldiers or prisoners of war.

In this feature of the warfare it becomes a duty of humanity that the civilized powers should insist upon the application of the laws of war recognized among civilized nations to both armies. As our own people are drawn into this struggle on both sides, and enter either army without the consent of our Government and in violation of our laws, their treatment when they may be wounded or captured, although it is not regulated by treaty and ceases to be a positive care of our Government, should not be left to the revengeful retaliations which expose them to the fate of pirates or other felons.

The inability of Spain to subdue the revolutionists by the measures and within the time that would be reasonable when applied to occasions of ordinary civil disturbance is a misfortune that can not be justly visited upon citizens of the United States, nor can it be considered that a state of open civil war does not exist, but that the movement is a mere insurrection and its supporters a mob of criminal violators of the law, when it is seen that it requires an army of 100,000 men and all the naval and military power of a great kingdom even to hold the alleged rebellion in check.

It is due to the situation of affairs in Cuba that Spain should recognize the existence of a state of war in the island, and should voluntarily accord to the armies opposed to her authority the rights of belligerents under the laws of nations.

The Congress of the United States, recognizing the fact that the matters herein referred to are properly within the control of the Chief Executive until, within the principles of our Constitution, it becomes the duty of Congress to define the final attitude of the Government of the United States toward Spain, presents these considerations to the President in support of the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the present deplorable war in the Island of Cuba has reached a magnitude that concerns all civilized nations to the extent that it should be conducted, if unhappily it is longer to continue, on those principles and laws of warfare that are acknowledged to be obligatory upon civilized nations when engaged in open hostilities, including the treatment of captives who are enlisted in either army; due respect to cartels for exchange of prisoners and for other military purposes; truces and flags of truce, the provision of proper hospitals and hospital supplies, and services to the sick and wounded of either army.

"Resolved further, That this representation of the views and opinions of Congress be sent to the President; and if he concurs therein that he will, in a friendly spirit, use the good offices of this Government to the end that Spain shall be requested to accord to the armies with which it is engaged in war the rights of belligerents, as the same are recognized under the laws of nations."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I present the views of the minority, accompanied by a resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the views of the minority and the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions reported by the majority of the committee will be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution reported by the minority will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to interpose his friendly offices with the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. PLATT. Now, let the whole minority report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be read.

The Secretary read the views of the minority, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

After the cessation of our civil war we were called upon to take notice of the struggle in Cuba against Spanish rule which broke out in October, 1868. It is said that early in the year 1869 a proclamation was actually signed by President Grant recognizing the Cubans as belligerents, although the fact was known to very few persons. This proclamation was not promulgated, owing to the opposition of Secretary Fish. In December, 1869, President Grant, in his first annual message, called the attention of Congress to this struggle. He said:

"For more than a year a valuable province of Spain, and a near neighbor of ours, in whom all our people can not but feel a deep interest, has been struggling for independence and freedom. The people and Government of the United States entertain these same warm feelings and sympathies for the people of Cuba in their pending struggle that they manifested throughout the previous struggles between Spain and her former colonies in behalf of the latter. But the contest has at no time assumed the conditions which amount to a war in the sense of international law, or which would show the existence of a de facto political organization of the insurgents sufficient to justify a recognition of belligerence. The principle is maintained, however, that this nation is its own judge when to accord the rights of belligerency, either to a people struggling to free themselves from a government they believe to be oppressive, or to independent nations at war with each other."

He concluded that in due time Spain must find it for its interest to establish its dependency as an independent power which could then exercise its right of choice as regarded its future relations with other powers.

The Cuban war which broke out in 1868 had been in existence for only nine months when our Government felt the necessity of interference. Mr. Sickles was appointed our minister to Madrid in 1869, and instructions were given to him to submit propositions on the part of our Government, in order to bring to a close the "civil conflict" raging in Cuba. The part taken by our Government at that time in Cuban affairs is full of interest, not only as regards the engagement into which the authorities were willing to enter, but also as respects the status which the instructions gave to the Cuban conflict. Our minister was directed to impress upon the Spanish mind "the advancing growth of that sentiment which claims for every part of the American hemisphere the right of self-government and freedom from transatlantic dependence." The good offices of the United States were offered to the cabinet at Madrid for the purpose of bringing to a close "the civil war now ravaging the Island of Cuba." The bases of settlement were:

1. The independence of Cuba to be acknowledged by Spain.
2. Cuba to pay Spain an indemnity for her relinquishment of all her rights in the island.
3. The abolition of slavery.
4. An armistice pending negotiations of settlement.

Our minister was also authorized to state that if Spain insisted, our Government might guarantee the payment of the indemnity by Cuba.

His attention was called particularly to the expression used in the instructions, "the civil war now ravaging the island."

While this expression is not designed to grant any public recognition of belligerent rights to the insurgents, it is nevertheless used advisably and in recognition of a state and condition of the contest which may not justify a much longer withholding of the concession to the revolutionary party of the recognized rights of belligerents. Should the expression, therefore, be commented upon you will admit what is above stated with reference to it, and may add, in case of a protracted discussion, or the prospect of a refusal by Spain to accept the proposed offer of the United States, that an early recognition of belligerent rights is the logical deduction from the present proposal, and will probably be deemed a necessity on the part of the United States unless the condition of the parties to the contest shall have changed very materially.

Negotiations were at once entered upon by our minister with the Spanish Government, and the proposition of the United States was submitted to General Prim, the president of the council of state, who was then at the head of Spanish affairs, and practically dictator in Spain. Prim asked how much Cuba would give, and it was suggested that $125,000,000 might be arranged. Prim intimated that autonomy to Cuba would be conceded as soon as hostilities ceased, but that Spain could not entertain the question of the independence of Cuba as long as the Cubans were in arms against the Government. He also declined to consider the Cubans as parties to be consulted in the negotiation.

He was willing to assure Cuban independence if, after laying down their arms, the Cubans should vote for a separation, although he would not insist upon the necessity of such a vote. That for his part, if he alone were consulted, he would say to the Cubans, "Go, if you will; make good the treasure you have cost us, and let us bring home our army in peace, and consolidate the liberties and resources of Spain." He added that he had no doubt that whatever might be the result of the conflict, Cuba would eventually be free; that he recognized without hesitation the manifest course of events on the American Continent, and the inevitable termination of all colonial relations in their autonomy as soon as they were prepared for independence; but he repeated, that no consideration would reconcile Spain to such a concession until hostilities ceased. His language was:

"I do not flatter myself that Spain will retain possession of the island. I consider that the period of colonial autonomy has virtually arrived. However the present contest may end, whether in the suppression of the insurrection or in the better way of an amicable arrangement through the assistance of the United States, it is equally clear to me that the time has come for Cuba to govern herself; and if we succeed in putting down the insurrection to-morrow, I shall regard the subject in the same light, that the child has attained its majority and should be allowed to direct its own affairs. We want nothing more than to get out of Cuba, but it must be done in a dignified and honorable manner."

Our Government saw the futility of accepting the conditions suggested by Spain. They recognized that nothing could be effected by a plebiscite, and that the Cubans could not be induced to lay down their arms and trust the Spaniards to carry out their promises. Moreover, while the negotiations were in progress the public became informed of them. Immediately a great excitement arose, communicated by the press, which disinclined the Spanish administration to pursue the matter, and our Government, finding itself unable to effect any good purpose, withdrew its offer of mediation.

Mr. Sickles wrote Mr. Fish that Spain deprecated the expression of the sympathy of the Government and people of the United States for the cause of the revolutionists, as well as the President's declaration of the right of the Government of the United States to determine when it may rightfully proclaim its neutrality in the conflict between a colony struggling for independence and the parent state. It is remarkable, was the comment of Mr. Sickles, that in all these discussions the fact is overlooked that Spain conceded the rights of belligerents to the Confederates without waiting for the outbreak of hostilities.

"The Queen's proclamation of June, 1861, is forgotten; and the large and profitable commerce carried on between Habana and the blockaded ports of the South in enemies' ships, which changed their flags in Cuban waters is quite ignored."

On the failure of negotiations, the logical result of our action was to recognize the Cubans as belligerents engaged in a "civil war." As was said by Secretary Fish, the mere offer on our part to mediate as between the contending forces was in itself a concession of belligerency and a recognition of that condition. But for various reasons this argument was not pressed by our Government. Although from month to month the aggressiveness of the revolutionists increased and their power extended, our Government, speaking through the State Department and the President, continued to inform the country that the Cubans had not reached such a condition as entitled them to be recognized as belligerents, although the Administration had already in instructions to our own minister to Spain recognized that condition at a time when the revolution had hardly attained any headway.

One of the reasons for this inconsistency was the expectation felt by our Government that Spain would voluntarily concede to the Cubans much that they were struggling for. Liberal ministries succeeded one another in Spain each of which was more liberal than its predecessor in promises of reform and recognition of the rights of the Cubans. Civil war broke out in Spain, and its Government became involved in such difficulties that ours was loath to press the subject of Cuba or to insist upon a speedy solution of the question. Mr. Fish was irritated by the operation of the Cuban junta in this country, which at times infringed our neutrality laws. He thought they should have confined their activity to sending to the insurgents arms and munitions of war, which he says they might have done "consistently with our own statutes and with the law of nations." At home the Federal Administration had to deal with the pressing question of the reconstruction of the South. The negro problem in this country was of such importance that the Administration had no desire to add difficulties by undertaking to settle the negro question in Cuba.

The action of our Government was in striking contrast to that of Spain in recognizing the Confederates as belligerents. Mr. Fish refers to this in a letter to Señor Roberts, the Spanish minister, in 1869:

"The civil war in Cuba has continued for a year; battle after battle has been fought: thousands of lives have been sacrificed, and the result is still in suspense. But the United States have hitherto resisted the considerations which in 1861 controlled the action of Spain and determined her to act upon the occurrence of a single bloodless conflict of arms and within sixty days from its date."

Six years later, in 1875, this Government was again on the point of intervening. In a dispatch from Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Cushing, then minister to Spain, the Secretary said that the condition of Cuba was the one great cause of perpetual solicitude in the foreign relations of the United States. He informed the minister that the President did not meditate the annexation of Cuba to the United States, but its elevation as an independent republic—

"The desire of independence [the Secretary says] on the part of the Cubans is a natural and legitimate aspiration of theirs, because they are Americans. That the ultimate issue of events in Cuba will be its independence, however that issue may be produced, whether by means of negotiation, or as the result of military operations, or of one of those unexpected incidents which so frequently determine the fate of nations, it is impossible to doubt. If there be one lesson in history more cogent in its teachings than any other, it is that no part of America large enough to constitute a self-sustaining state can be permanently held in forced colonial subjection to Europe. Complete separation between the metropolis and its colony may be postponed by the former conceding to the latter a greater or less degree of local autonomy, nearly approaching to independence. But in all cases where a positive antagonism has come to exist between the mother country and its colonial subjects, where the sense of oppression is strongly felt by the latter, and especially where years of relentless warfare have alienated the parties one from another more widely than they are sundered by the ocean itself, their political separation is inevitable. It is one of those conclusions which have been aptly called the inexorable logic of events."

Thus we have shown that already, in 1869, when the revolution of the preceding year had attained but inconsiderable proportions, President Grant expressed his firm conviction that the ultimate result of the struggle for independence would be to break the bonds which attached Cuba as a colony to Spain. President Grant announced the determination of our Government to intervene if the struggle in Cuba was not speedily terminated. It was pointed out that while the Spanish authorities insisted that a state of war did not exist in Cuba, and that no rights as belligerents should be accorded to the revolutionists, they at the same time demanded for themselves all the rights and privileges which flowed from actual and acknowledged war. That Cuba exhibited a chronic condition of turbulence and rebellion was due to the system pursued by Spain and the want of harmony between the inhabitants of the island and the governing class. That should it become necessary for this Government to intervene it would be moved by the necessity for a proper regard to its own protection and its own interests and the interests of humanity.

The inhuman manner in which the war was waged and the shocking executions of natives and citizens of this country made an impression of horror on the world.

The nicest sense of international requirements can not fail to perceive that provocation from Spain was overlooked by our Government for a longer period and with greater patience than any other Government of equal power would have tolerated. A writer in the London Times, in 1875, reflecting upon the possibility of Spain's overcoming the then insurrection, and on the prospect of our interference, said:

"Were Cuba as near to Cornwall as it is to Florida we should certainly look more sharply to matters of fact than to the niceties of international law. But everything, we repeat, depends upon these matters of fact. If Spain can suppress the insurrection and prevent Cuba from becoming a permanent source of mischief to neighboring countries, she has the fullest right to keep it. But she is on her trial, and that trial can not be long. When she is made to clearly understand that the tenure of her rule over Cuba depends upon her ability to make that rule a reality, she will not be slow to show what she can do, and the limits of her power will be the limits of her right."

In 1869 Gen. Martinez Campos, the greatest soldier Spain possessed, was sent to Cuba to make a final effort to bring hostilities there to a termination. He was not only a great soldier, but was believed to be a great administrator, and had the respect of all parties on account of his patriotism and integrity. He was afforded all the aid in the way of men and money which Spain could furnish. In 1878 he succeeded in the so-called pacification, for which service he was raised to the highest pinnacle in Spain and made prime minister. He did not conquer the insurgents, but induced them to lay down their arms on conditions of peace which, as the Spanish administrator, he undertook for his Government should be faithfully carried out.

A treaty of peace was negotiated with the leaders of the revolution. In 1879 General Campos wrote a long dispatch to his Government from the seat of his triumph, which at this day is extremely interesting, owing to the fact that the present war owes its origin to the same circumstances as caused the former outbreak. In this dispatch, stating the particulars of the pacification, General Campos gave an extended review of the situation in Cuba and of the terms of the treaty of peace and the negotiations which led thereto. This recital shows that General Campos believed, as was afterwards said by our minister, James Russell Lowell, that the reforms he stipulated were necessary if Cuba was to be retained as a dependency of Spain, and, Mr. Lowell remarked, all intelligent Spaniards admitted that the country could not afford another war. As a reason for according conditions to the Cubans General Campos sketched the motives of his policy:

"Since the year 1869, when I landed on this island with the first reenforcements, I was preoccupied with the idea that the insurrection here, though acknowledging as its cause the hatred of Spain, yet this hatred was due to the causes that have separated our colonies from the mother country, augmented in the present case by the promises made to the Antillas at different times (1812, 1837, and 1845), promises which not only have not been fulfilled, but, as I understand, have not been permitted to be so by the Cortes when at different times their execution had been begun.

"While the island had no great development, its aspirations were confined by love of nationality and respect for authority; but when one day after another passed without hopes being satisfied, but, on the contrary, the greater freedom permitted now and then by a governor was more than canceled by his successor; when they were convinced that the colony went on in the same way; when bad officials and a worse administration of justice more and more aggravated difficulties; when the provincial governorships, continually growing worse, fell at last into the hands of men without training or education, petty tyrants who could practice their thefts and sometimes their oppressions because of the distance at which they resided from the supreme authority, public opinion, until then restrained, began vehemently to desire those liberties which, if they bring much good, contain also some evil. * * * The 10th of October, 1868, came to open men's eyes; the eruption of the volcano in which so many passions, so many hatreds, just and unjust, had been heaped up was terrible, and almost at the outset the independence of Cuba was proclaimed."

He showed the gains speedily made by the insurgents and the advantages they had by reason of the familiarity with the country, so that "they defeated large columns with hardly a battalion of men. They almost put us on the defensive, and as we had to guard an immense property the mission of the army became very difficult." He recounted his efforts to reestablish the principle of authority, but said that he had against him a "public spirit without life. Nobody had higher aspirations than to save his crop of sugar. In official regions the enemy was thought inferior, but the commanders generally believed it unsafe to operate with less than three battalions; there was no venturing beyond the highways."

He said little was gained by beating the enemy. What he needed was to exterminate them, and that he could not do. That had his responsibility been free of the Cortes and the Government he would in the beginning have ventured everything to secure peace—the disembargo of estates, a general pardon, the assimilation of Cuba with Spain, orders to treat prisoners well—and to show that this was not weakness, but strength, there was "the argument of his 100,000 bayonets." He finally related the terms by which he induced the Cubans to lay down their arms. All desired reforms were promised. Municipal law, the law of provincial assemblies, and representation in the Cortes should be established; the jurisdiction of the courts defined, tax laws settled, the form of contribution and assessments determined, schools established, the people to be consulted through their representative as to all these reforms and others, and they were not to be left to the will of the captain-general or the head of a department. This summary is sufficient to indicate what was stipulated between the parties. Said General Campos:

"I do not wish to make a momentary peace; I desire that this peace be the beginning of a bond of common interest between Spain and her Cuban provinces, and that this bond be drawn closer by the identity of aspirations and the good faith of both. Let not the Cubans be considered as pariahs or children, but put on an equality with other Spaniards in everything not inconsistent with their present condition. Perhaps [he concluded] the insurgents would have accepted promises less liberal and more vague than those set forth in this condition; but even had this been done, it would have been but a brief postponement, because those liberties are destined to come for the reasons already given, with the difference that Spain now shows herself magnanimous, satisfying just aspirations which she might deny, and a little later, probably very soon, would have been obliged to grant them, compelled by the force of ideas and of the age. Moreover, she has promised over and over again to enter on the path of assimilation, and if the promise were more vague, even though the fulfillment of this promise were begun, these people would have a right to doubt our good faith, and to show a distrust unfortunately warranted by the failings of human nature itself. The not adding another 100,000 to the 100,000 families that mourn their sons slain in this pitiless war, and the cry of peace that will resound in the hearts of the 80,000 mothers who have sons in Cuba or liable to conscription, would be a full equivalent for the payment of a debt of justice."

This debt of justice has not yet been paid.

The highest Spanish authorities have been obliged to confess that the grievances of the Cubans are just and their aspirations for liberty legitimate.

Marshal Serrano, in his official report to the Spanish Government of the 10th of May, 1867, said:

"We are forced to acknowledge that in the last years the treasury of Cuba has been used abusively, which is partly the cause of the crisis the islands go through now and of the exhaustion of its resources."

Castelar, in 1873, while President, endeavored to convince Spain of the necessity of making reforms demanded alike by "humanity and civilization," and he deplored making Cuba a "transatlantic Poland." In 1874 our minister to Spain informed our Government that the entire unwillingness of Spain to do anything toward the amelioration of Cuba was shown by the fact that all the governments since the breaking out of the revolution in 1868 had promised to reform the administration, but that the situation of the island was worse than ever. And Secretary Fish informed the Spanish Government that most of the evils of which Cuba was the scene were the necessary results of harsh treatment and of the maladministration of the colonial government.

In 1875 Mr. Cushing, then minister to Madrid, communicated to our Government a large amount of evidence from Spanish sources showing the demoralization existing in the administration in Cuba. The Spanish journals of that date openly informed the central government that war in Cuba could never be ended until the vices of the ultramarine administration were corrected and its moral tone raised. Spain was exhorted to make one supreme effort for the pacification of Cuba and its moralization.

"The journals of all shades of opinion speak of the official corruption," said Mr. Cushing, "and peculations of the public employees in Cuba as a feature of the situation not less calamitous than the insurrection." He remarked that the burden of taxation had become intolerable, aggravated as it was by the frauds and wastes committed by almost everybody connected with the collection or expenditure of the public moneys; that the abuses of administration, of which so much was being said at that time, were old, chronic, deep-rooted, and impossible of eradication under the colonial régime. "It would seem that each of the ephemeral parties on attaining power, with a crowd of eager partisans behind it like troops of howling wolves, shakes off as many as it can upon Cuba."

Notwithstanding that the public press did not cease to advise the Government that the immorality of the public administration of the island offered a vast field to censure, nothing was done to improve its condition. It was thought by the central government that it was only necessary by force to save Cuba to Spain. It was common remark, however, that the Government ought to sustain two campaigns in Cuba—one against insurrection and the other against corruption. Said Mr. Cushing:

"So merely mercenary and so regardless of duty and the public weal are many of the public officers who go out to the island as to cause the saying to become current that on embarking they leave all sense of shame behind them in Cadiz."

And he observed that all testimony was unanimous as to the corruptions and the embezzlements of the administrations of Cuba.

The testimony of Mr. Cushing is of the most convincing character, as he has never been accused of being unfriendly to Spain. That he did not draw a too highly colored picture of Spanish misrule is shown by the declaration of the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid in an official paper quoted by Mr. Fish in 1874:

"A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying, by their dominant and exclusive authority, the vital energies of the country and the creative and productive activity of free individuals. And although the system may now have improved in some of its details, the domineering action of the authorities being less felt, it still appears full of the original error, which is upheld by the force of tradition and the necessary influence of interests created under their protection. A change of system, political as well as administrative, is therefore imperatively demanded."

It is needless to say no such change has been made.

The Spanish Government to-day in Cuba is of the same character as it was when Richard Henry Dana visited the island in 1854, "an armed monarchy encamped in the midst of a disarmed and disfranchised people; an unmixed despotism of one nation over another." Dana warned the public against the testimony of Americans and other foreigners engaged in business in Cuba as to the condition of affairs there:

"Of all classes of persons I know of none whose situation is more unfavorable to the growth and development of sentiments of patriotism and philanthropy and of interest in the future of a race than foreigners temporarily resident, for purposes of money-making only, in a country with which they have nothing in common in the future or the past. This class is often called impartial. I do not agree to the use of that term. They are indeed free from the bias of feeling or sentiment, but they are subject to the attractions of interest. It is for their immediate advantage to preserve peace and the existing order of things."

That the condition of Cuba had not improved prior to the present war is shown by a report of our consul-general at Habana to the State Department in 1885. This stated that the entire population, with the exception of the official class, was living under a tyranny unparalleled at this day on the globe.

"There is a system of oppression and torture which enters into every phase of life, eats into the soul of every Cuban, mortifies, injures, and insults him every hour, impoverishes him and his family from day to day, threatens the rich man with bankruptcy and the poor man with beggary. The exactions of the Spanish Government and the illegal outrages of its officers are in fact intolerable. They have reduced the island to despondency and ruin. * * * The Government at Madrid is directly answerable for the misery of Cuba and for the rapacity and venality of its subordinates. * * * No well-informed Spaniard imagines that Cuba will long continue to submit to this tyranny, or at least that she will long be able to yield this harvest to her oppressors. Spain cares nothing whatever for the interests, the prosperity, or the sufferings of her colony. The Government does almost nothing to ameliorate any of the evils of the country. The police are everywhere insufficient and inefficient. The roads are no roads at all. Every interest which might enrich and improve the island is looked upon by the officials as one more mine to exploit. * * * Cuba is held solely for the benefit of Spain and Spanish interests, for the sake of Spanish adventurers. Against this all rebel in thought and feeling if not yet in fact and deed. * * * They wish protection from the grasping rapacity of Spain and see no way to attain it except by our aid."

He concluded that from the general misery war must ensue of such a savage character that the world would be shocked and the United States would be compelled from sheer humanity to interfere and save a country which Spain would be unable either to control or to preserve. He had learned from many quarters that in any future attempt to change the condition of affairs all the inhabitants would go hand in hand; "it is generally understood that the permanent white population is of one mind."

While some of the reforms stipulated for by the Cubans and engaged to be carried out by General Campos in 1879 were nominally granted, they were all substantially withheld. The central government did not feel itself bound after the cessation of hostilities was secured to perform the conditions by which that result was brought about. Our consul-general reported (1885) "that the island is worse governed than at any previous period of its history."

"Cuba, it was determined, must pay the entire cost of the war. At the time when the fostering care of the Government was most needed to heal the wounds inflicted by the war, when every interest was prostrate and every business suffering, new and enormous taxes were imposed. * * * A war tax of the most exaggerated character was laid. Every business, trade, art, or profession is taxed in the proportion of from 25 to 33½ per cent of its net income. * * * All ordinary mercantile business and all the petty trades and employments of the country are separately suffering. All participate in the common distress."

He stated that the absolute legal tax imposed on the island was only a part of what the wretched and impoverished inhabitants were compelled to pay.

"It is a matter of notoriety that illegal charges are constantly made and then taken off for a bribe. The hordes of officials who batten like hungry beasts on the vitals of Cuba make no pretense of honesty except on paper. The highest officers, when they chance to be better than their subordinates, admit the character of their inferiors; more often they share it. * * * The present state of things can not continue. Some change amounting almost to revolution is inevitable. What with governmental oppression and illegal tyranny, emancipation, brigandage, low prices for sugar and high taxes on everything, the ruin of the island is already almost consummated. She is absolutely incapacitated for rendering the revenue demanded or supporting the army of officials who keep her prostrate in her agony."

Shortly after Mr. Blaine became Secretary of State, in the Administration of President Harrison, it was the subject of consideration whether Spain could be induced to acknowledge Cuba as independent should the United States agree to guarantee the sum to be paid by Cuba for the relinquishment of all Spanish rights in the island. This movement was made by the sugar planters, and it was thought that the entire sugar interest would support it. Mr. Blaine announced himself warmly in favor of the project, but after long conferences it was ascertained that the consent of Spain could not be obtained.

In truth, the pacification effected by Martinez Campos in 1878 was hardly efficient even as a truce. The reports of our consular agents, the testimony of travelers, the avowals made in the Spanish press, and the constant evidence almost daily recurring in the Cuban press, show that between 1878 and 1895 Cuba enjoyed little peace or repose. Brigandage, which was merely one form of public discontent, never ceased. Only the presence of a very large Spanish army prevented organized war.

The danger and the scandal of the Cuban situation have been such as can be compared with nothing but the condition of Armenia. So serious did they become, and so imminent was the peril, that in 1894-95 the Spanish Government at last adopted measures looking to the partial satisfaction of Cuban demands. These measures we need not discuss. They were held by the old insurgent party to be illusory and deceptive. Another attempt at independence was decided upon, and in February, 1895, the present "sanguinary and fiercely conducted war" broke out, "in some respects more active than the last preceding revolt." In thus characterizing the situation in Cuba as a state of war, President Cleveland, like Secretary Fish, has cleared the subject of all preliminary doubts. A state of war exists in Cuba. With that, and with that alone, we have to deal.

The precedents are clear, and if our action were to be decided by precedent alone, we should not be able to hesitate. The last great precedent was that of the civil war which broke out in the United States in the spring of 1861. In that instance, without waiting for the outbreak of actual hostilities, further than the bloodless attack on Fort Sumter and its surrender April 13, 1861, the British Government issued its proclamation of neutrality on the 13th of May following, before it had received official information that war existed, except as a blockade of certain insurgent ports. The French Government acted in concert with Great Britain, but delayed the official announcement until June. The Spanish Government issued its proclamation of belligerency June 17; and the first battle of our war was not fought until July 21, or known at Madrid until August.

In this great instance the outbreak of insurrection and the recognition of belligerency were simultaneous. The United States protested against the precipitancy of the act, and have never admitted its justice or legality. Neither in 1869 nor in 1895 did the President enforce the precedent against Spain in regard to the insurrection in Cuba. Not even in 1875, when the insurgents held possession of a great part of the island and seacoast, with no restraint but the blockade, did the United States recognize their belligerency.

Yet belligerency is a question of fact, and if declared at all it should be declared whenever the true character of neutrality requires it or the exigencies of law need it. The nature of such action may be political or legal, or both. As a political act, impartiality requires that belligerency should be recognized whenever, existing in fact, its denial is equivalent to taking part with one of the belligerents against the other. In such cases the unrecognized belligerent has just ground for complaint. The moral support of the neutral government is given wholly to its opponent. That the Cuban insurgents were belligerents in fact as early as 1869 was expressly stated by Mr. Fish when he explained the meaning he attached to his phrase regarding "the civil war now ravaging the island." The word "war" in such conditions necessarily implies the fact of belligerency. President Cleveland, in his annual message of last month, informs us that the present war is more active than the preceding one.

Nevertheless, our Government has still refrained from what Mr. Fish called "any public recognition of belligerent rights to the insurgents." No legal necessity arose to require it, and the political exigency was not absolute. Yet, after the victory of Bayamo, in the month of July last, when the insurgents defeated and nearly captured the captain-general, Martinez Campos, and gained military possession of the whole eastern half of the island, the fact of their belligerency was established, and if further evidence was needed it was fully given by the subsequent victory at Coliseo, on the 24th of December, when the insurgents drove the captain-general back to Havana and gained military control of the western provinces.

If the Government of the United States still refrained from recognizing the belligerency of the insurgents after this conclusive proof of the fact, the reason doubtless was that in the absence of any legal complications the question became wholly political, and that its true solution must lie not in a recognition of belligerency, but in a recognition of independence.

In 1875, when the situation was very far from being as serious as it is now, President Grant, after long consideration of the difficulties involved in public action, decided against the recognition of belligerency as an act which might be delusive to the insurgents and would certainly be regarded as unfriendly by Spain. He decided upon a middle course. The documents above quoted show that he proposed to the Spanish Government a sort of intervention which should establish the independence of Cuba by a friendly agreement. In doing so he not only necessarily recognized both parties to the conflict as on an equal plane, but he also warned Spain that if such mediation should not be accepted, direct intervention would probably be deemed a necessity on the part of the United States.

Spain preferred to promise to the insurgents terms so favorable as to cause for a time the cessation of hostilities. Since then twenty years have passed. The insurrection, far from having ceased, has taken the proportions of a war almost as destructive to our own citizens as to the contending parties. The independence of Cuba was then regarded by the President of the United States as the object of his intervention, and has now become far more inevitable than it was then. Evidently the Government of the United States can do no less than to take up the subject precisely where President Grant left it, and to resume the friendly mediation which he actually began, with all the consequences which necessarily would follow its rejection.

Confident that no other action than this accords with our friendly relations with Spain, our just sympathy with the people of Cuba, and with our own dignity and consistency, I recommend the following resolution to the consideration of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to interpose his friendly offices with the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba."

ARREST OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

Mr. GRAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 21st instant, relating to the arrest of certain American citizens in Cuba, to report it with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inquire into the arrest and forcible removal of Mark E. Rodriguez, a citizen of the United States, on board the United States mail steamer Olivette in the harbor of Habana on Wednesday, the 15th instant; also into the arrest of Luis Someillan and his son, citizens of the United States, in the city of Habana; and, if no just cause for such arrest exists, to demand their immediate release.

The amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in line 8, after the word "Habana," to strike out the remainder of the resolution in the following words:

And, if no just cause for such arrest exists, to demand their immediate release.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1450) to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference, 1889.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota;

A bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 102) authorizing the wearing of the distinctive badge adopted by the Sons of Veterans, United States Army, upon all occasions of ceremony.

IMPRISONMENT OF EUGENE V. DEBS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. CALL, by request, that a committee of seven Senators be appointed who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into the imprisonment of Eugene V. Debs for an alleged contempt of court.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. I ask that the substitute which I offered in place of the resolution be read.

Mr. CALL. There are several Senators interested in this matter who desire that the resolution shall go over, if it can be done by unanimous consent, without losing its place, until the next meeting of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he ask that the resolution lie upon the table subject to call, so that the Chair will not be compelled to lay it before the Senate every morning.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that, the resolution not losing its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know exactly what is the proposed order. I was looking at the RECORD when the Chair asked for consent. I presumed there would be no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is that the resolution with the proposed substitute shall go to the table subject to call. That was the request of the Senator from Florida as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. Does that mean that it is in order for a Senator to call it up at any time, or that it is simply subject to a motion to take it up at any time?

Mr. CALL. I will state that I understand it is subject to be called up at any time, it having gone over without losing its place of preference on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that under the agreement just made at the request of a Senator the resolution will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. To-morrow; in one day?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes, at any time in the morning hour after the conclusion of routine business.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Florida, as evidently no one will want to call up the resolution to-morrow or the next day (which are probably the last days of the debate on the pending bill), whether he had not better let the resolution and the substitute go to the Committee on the Judiciary, simply referring it. I think I am not presumptuous (though, of course, I can only speak for one) in assuring the Senator that the committee will deal with the subject at its first meeting, which will be next Monday. If they do not, the Senator will then have it in his power to introduce another resolution and get exactly the same right to consideration that he now has for this one. He will not lose anything in his control of the matter. Would it not be better, therefore, as nobody would expect to take it up to-morrow or the next day, to let the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary? I think the committee will report upon it promptly; and if it does not, I repeat to the Senator that he has absolute control of the matter, as he can introduce another resolution.

Mr. CALL. I am disposed to accede to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I have no doubt that that committee will act promptly if the reference is made, and I will therefore agree to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 28th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the appointment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.

INVESTIGATION OF MAIL BAG REPAIR DIVISION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. KYLE was read, as follows:

Whereas the character of the wages, work, discipline, and hours of labor in the mail bag repair division of the Government Post-Office Department have been severely condemned by the Washington Times, a reputable newspaper published in the District of Columbia; and

Whereas it is also alleged by this newspaper that Government mail bags are made by contract convict labor, and that there are also various irregularities in the fulfillment and payments of awards as well as irregularities in other contracts pertaining to the work of this division: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is hereby directed to investigate these charges and report thereon to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I wish this resolution might be adopted this morning without debate, as it is very simple and in accordance with the direct action of the Senate in such matters. It is not for the appointment of a select committee, as requested yesterday by the Senator from Florida, but an investigation to be made by one of the standing committees of the Senate, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The matter as set forth is in but three lines:

That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is hereby directed to investigate these charges and report thereon to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

That is all there is of it.

The reason for this investigation is set forth in the preamble, where it is stated that—

The character of the wages, work, discipline, and hours of labor in the mail bag repair division of the Government Post-Office Department have been severely condemned by the Washington Times, a reputable newspaper published in the District of Columbia; and whereas it is also alleged by this newspaper that Government mail bags are made by contract convict labor, and that there are also various irregularities in the fulfillment and payments of awards as well as irregularities in other contracts pertaining to the work of this division.

Mr. President, I submit that these are very serious charges against a prominent officer of this Government. I have not had the pleasure of consulting with the Postmaster-General or with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Neilson, but I take it upon myself to say that they would demand an investigation were they present here to-day.

The charge is made in the Times of this city, and is set forth most clearly in a leaded-type editorial of the 21st of January, this year, which I shall read:

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR THE GOVERNMENT GUILLOTINE.

It has been clearly demonstrated by the Times investigation of the department of mail-bag repairs that Uncle Sam is proprietor of a sweat shop almost as objectionable and horrifying in its details as those of New York City. The character of the work is even more repulsive, as it embraces the mending of old sacks impregnated with nauseating smells, and the pay of the employees is based on the sweat-shop system of piecework, and is so low that they must either slave or starve.

Recently the managers of this slave-driving den saw fit to cut down the pay of women employees without interfering with the wages of the men. This injustice illustrates but one of the wrongs to which women must submit who are unfortunate enough to be compelled to work in that place, and as the postal authorities refuse to act on the appeals of these much-abused employees it is time Congress took steps to make an investigation of this lamentable condition of affairs.

The people of the United States do not want Uncle Sam to employ women at the low wages of from 40 to 60 cents a day, especially at work that is as trying and laborious as mending rotten and filthy mail sacks. Nor do they desire to have to allow them to be subjected to the indignities of which some of these poor women complain, and should that information be telegraphed throughout the country there would be a general demand for the discharge of the officials responsible for such outrages.

The miserable excuse of the authorities that "if the women do not care to work at the low wages paid they need not do so, as there are plenty of others in the city who would be glad of the opportunity," is the same apology made by the New York sweat-shop keepers. It is that of a heartless taskmaster who rejoices in the sufferings of those under his supervision; and in this instance, when a reduction of wages puts nothing into the pockets of the Government sweat-shop managers, it illustrates a species of inexcusable cruelty. Let Congress use the Government guillotine on these offending managers. Their official heads should be made to pay the penalty of their misconduct.

Mr. President, I have before me copies of the Times for the past ten or twelve days. The investigation has been made by one of the Times reporters. The wages paid in former days and those paid at the present time are given, and I suppose most members of this body who have read the Times have seen them.

As to work in the mail bag repair division, I wish to say that in former days those engaged in repairing the sacks made from $1.50 to $1.75 per day. Since the piecework plan has been adopted those repairing mail sacks have been cut down to 3¾ cents a sack for mending, one-fourth of a cent being deducted for the use of the machines, thereby necessitating the cutting of their wages to 3 cents for the repair of sacks by the use of the machines. These employees are able by this means, as stated by the Times reporter, to make only about 97½ cents a day.

There is another class of employees—the darners. The darners are those who patch small holes in the mail sacks. They are able to darn from 30 to 50 sacks a day, and for this they get the enormous sum of 1 cent per sack. These employees earn from 50 to 75 cents a day. They are under, let me say, the most rigid inspection that can be made.

More than this, it is learned that these girls are docked when late to their work. Here is the Times' statement:

It is stated that when the women are late at their work, by reason of delayed trains or otherwise, they are fined to the extent of a quarter of a day. A woman who makes 50 cents a day will be paid for that day only 37½ cents.

I might say a word right here, Mr. President, in regard to the character of this work. It is work that is disgusting to a degree. It is work that is sometimes nauseating. After introducing the resolution here yesterday some person in this city saw fit to send me a sample sack by mail, which I received last night. One could smell it across the room, and my secretary directed some one to immediately remove it from his presence.

It is stated by the Times that the old sacks are resurrected from the corners of the basements of buildings, where they have been beds, for instance, of dogs and of cats; and it is stated by employees here that dead cats and dead dogs have been found in the mail sacks that are sent into the Government shop for repair. The women working by the piecemeal method are compelled to stitch, stich, hour by hour, in sweat-shop fashion, upon these sacks, and for the mere pittance of from 50 to 97 cents a day.

I shall not take the time, Mr. President, to read what I have here, namely, a letter from one of the ladies who has worked in this shop of the Post-Office Department and who states the facts exactly as they are. It might be well to place it in the RECORD, and as a part of my remarks.

THEY ALL THANK THE TIMES.

"We are all indebted to the Times for the manner in which it has called this case to the attention of the public," said a woman who as an expert mail-bag repairer gets $1.25 a day as a maximum payment.

"Our next wish is that Congress will speedily take hold of the matter and, in addition to granting us living wages, will put us in better quarters or improve the ones we are now in.

"If all the things were told that could be related about this sweat shop they would make a tale that would change Hood's 'Song of the Shirt' into prophecy. I could recite a dozen instances where weary fingers, worn away at the ends, have plied the needle and thread while tears moistened the cloth the operator was sewing. Often, too, the tears have so dimmed the eyes that I have seen poor women have to get up and leave the room for a while in order to calm their feelings.

"One who has never been in the repair shop has no idea of the filth and dirt there is about the mail bags sent there for repair. Frequently they come in with the holes in them stuffed with every conceivable thing, from paper and wisps of straw to a potato or an onion."

BAD ONIONS AND DEAD DOGS.

"In the big post-offices, where the bags are thrown away in a corner, it is not uncommon that a kitten climbs in the top or through a hole in the side and goes to sleep. Other bags are thrown on top of this sack and the kitten is smothered. Then the whole assortment of bags is sent off here to the repair shop, possibly three months later, and the dead kitten is found for the first time.

"Such things as that are no fairy tales, I assure you, and on an occasion not very long ago I saw three of the girls in the shop faint when a little dead dog was taken from a mail sack.

"One of the most weird, ghastly, and unpleasant tasks falls on our hands when the sacks from a mail car that has been in a railroad wreck are sent to the shop. It is not an infrequent occurrence that the unfortunate mail clerk is killed and his mangled body is thrown among the sacks. I have seen them come to the girls for repair when they were covered with blood, and with here and there a fragment of flesh sticking to them.

"Why these bags can not be cleansed before they come to the women, or be permitted to go through men's hands first, so that some of the most objectionable things may be removed from them, I don't know. I simply know they are sent directly to us, and we have to handle them and inhale all the dust and filthy odors that arise from them."

What is the excuse given by the superintendent of this department, Mr. Neilson, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as to why these things are tolerated, and as to why these women are compelled to work for starvation wages? When a Times reporter went to him and made a statement of the case he merely replied, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" In view of these conditions, Mr. President, I believe it is time for Congress to do something about it. Here is what the Times of January 21 said:

The practical position of General Neilson as published in the Evening Times, "Yes, that is all true, but what are you going to do about it?" was, to say the least, unexpected. There was some hope that he had declined to act in favor of the employees for the reason that he was not familiar with the facts. On the contrary, he knows it, he knew it, and justifies it. The excuse of the highest authority on the subject appears to be that if the women could be made to work for less it would be a better thing for the Government. There is only one conclusion for General Neilson's remarks, viz, that there will be another reduction in wages as soon as the women grow strong enough to do more work for less pay. Why not have it done by the Chinese?

This is the burden of all the numerous clippings I have from the Times, of this city. I wish to ask the members of this body whether they are willing now to inaugurate sweat-shop practices in the conduct of governmental business? We are all familiar with the policy of the sweat shop. Investigations have been made by this body and by committees of the legislatures of various States which show that many manufacturers of clothing are in the habit of farming out their goods piecemeal, to be manufactured by "subs," who again sublet the work to other persons, until finally the garments are made in garrets by women at starvation wages. Women in New York City to-day are making shirts for 30 cents a dozen. This system has been inveighed against not only by nearly every State legislature and by Congress, but by every great labor organization and by all fair-minded citizens everywhere. Are we to-day willing to inaugurate sweat-shop practices in a Government establishment under the control of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General? It is protested against by the labor organizations. Last night, at a meeting of the Federation of Labor of this District, comprising more than forty bodies of organized labor, this question was introduced, and the following resolutions adopted unanimously:

Whereas it is the object of the Federation of Labor to use its endeavor to ameliorate the condition of the toiling masses who earn their daily bread from the oft grudging hands of capital; and

Whereas it is openly charged by a reliable and competent authority that there exists in that branch of the Post-Office Department known as the "mail bag repair department" a determined and apparently unscrupulous effort to crush its employees, and especially the female portion, into a state of abject servitude, under a system of work that renders it impossible for even the best operator to earn sufficient for the barest necessities of life; and

Whereas it is also charged that the supply of mail bags is procured by contract with an employer of convict labor, and that such bags are made by such convict labor: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Federation of Labor of the District of Columbia hereby testifies to its sympathies with the unfortunate employees of said department, and hereby gives its hearty indorsement to the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator KYLE, and urges its prompt passage, expressing the hope that similar action be taken in the other House, and also that the legislative committee of this federation be, and hereby is, directed to memorialize Congress to that effect and urge thorough investigation of both the charge of maladministration and the employment of convict labor.

That brings up another point, Mr. President, in regard to the mail bag repair division. I had supposed that the Government of the United States certainly did not indulge in the practice of hiring convict labor in the manufacture of its goods, but we have it charged by the Times in its editorial of January 24, and there is a telegram, printed in large type, with leaded lines, from a reputable gentleman in Brooklyn, N. Y., who says:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., January 23, 1896.

EDITOR WASHINGTON TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

All the labor in making bags under McNulty's contract is done in Kings County Penitentiary, for which he pays 3¼ cents apiece, making complete.

JAMES TAYLOR.

The Times' editorial of the same day states:

STOP THE PURCHASE OF PRISON-MADE GOODS.

Once again the Times calls on Congress to enact a law prohibiting Executive Departments of the Government from spending public funds to purchase the products of convict labor. Every article in Government use can be had direct from the hands of free labor, and it is not only outraging common decency to deprive honest working people of employment by patronizing jail birds, but there is no necessity for such an objectionable practice. Our exposé of the mail bag repair sweat shop has developed the information that the postal authorities are purchasing mail bags manufactured in the Brooklyn Penitentiary, and it is more than likely that other departments of the Government are also using public money to promote the convict-labor system.

No member of Congress would dare canvass for reelection if it were known that he approved of such a use of public funds. Sentiment throughout the country is too strongly opposed to the employment of convict labor to warrant such a risk, and it is generally understood that the candidate who takes the stump in favor of prison labor is practically as good as defeated. For that reason, if not from a humanitarian standpoint, members of Congress should support a measure to prohibit the further purchase of prison-made goods by any officer or agent of the Government.

On the other hand, it is the duty of Congress to protect free labor. Every article manufactured by convicts not only displaces the product of honest people in our markets, but also cheapens their wages. As a rule, convict labor is hired out to contractors at from 20 to 30 cents a day, and with the assistance of improved machinery jail birds are compelled to turn out about as much work as honest wage earners could produce in the same length of time. It is necessary to state that convict-made goods are sold in the same markets with the products of free labor, and that this competition is one of the causes of our low rate of wages. That fact is too well known to need elaboration, and it constitutes the main reason why Congress should stop the purchase of prison-made goods for the Government service.

This, Mr. President, is a clear statement of the case and a perfectly just arraignment of the practice of hiring convict labor, when thousands of honest American citizens are walking the streets in search of work, and when their wives and children at home are starving for bread.

I think it behooves the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make an investigation as to whether the mail bags of the United States are manufactured in the penitentiaries of the United States.

There is another matter in regard to this question, and that is the sale of the old, worn-out mail bags. I see it is charged in the Times—and that is a very serious charge—that the person who has control of the old and worn-out mail bags which are beyond repair sells them to the highest bidder in the market. The charge is further made that he has not always turned the checks into the Treasury Department, and that very frequently those checks are returned to the makers of them without having passed through the hands of the proper officials of the Treasury Department. This is a charge serious enough of itself to cause an investigation upon the part of the committee.

Mr. President, I hope that there will be no objection to the passage of this resolution. As I said at the beginning, there is no demand for a special committee; there is no demand for a cent of expenditure. The persons and the papers necessary to be examined are right here in the city of Washington, and an investigation can be made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads without a particle of trouble.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the duty which the Senator from South Dakota would impose upon the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is very serious, and it strikes me, at this stage of the proceedings, as a very unnecessary step.

If the Senator from South Dakota had taken the pains, or would now take the pains and the time, to call at the corner of Seventh and E streets and ask the Postmaster-General, or any one of the Assistant Postmasters-General—any of whom would be quick to see the Senator from South Dakota, if he should present himself in person or by his secretary at their offices—as to whether or not the mail bags are made by convict labor, as to whether or not the people who repair them are people who are poorly and insufficiently paid, as to whether or not the people who repair them are compelled to do such menial and unwholesome work that their health is endangered, he would receive a prompt and courteous and full answer.

Of course, the Senator comes here fortified by the statement which frightens every Senator, that the Federation of Labor, representing 40,000 different organizations, I believe, met last night and indorsed this resolution, which is, of course, an appalling and overwhelming statement, and makes one hesitate to stand for a moment and interpose even the slightest objection to any resolution backed by such an important body of intelligent citizens.

The Senator, however, states that he relies entirely upon a letter in the Washington Times. I understood the Senator to disclaim any sort of personal information on the subject. The Senator from South Dakota is one individual; he is overworked, it is true, but he must sacrifice his life in the public service. If he would only go to the office of the Washington Times and find out what authority they have for their statement, he could then come here armed with some kind of knowledge that would be better than an anonymous editorial. He might inquire who James Taylor of Brooklyn, is, who, I have not the slightest doubt, has made an entirely false statement as to the use of convict labor in the making of Government mail bags. If the Senator would take an hour or a half hour any morning, and go, first, to the office of the Washington Times, and then to the Postmaster-General, he could come here and throw a flood of light on the subject that would make more happy and more intelligent this entire body; but, instead of that, the Senator from South Dakota asks that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads—which really is a serious committee and a committee which has much work to do and which has got work piled up for it for the coming session, more than it can well attend to—sit as a committee of investigation, send for persons and papers, and swear witnesses upon the strength of some anonymous charges in a newspaper published here in Washington.

I speak without any sort of feeling of resentment or hostility to the Senator from South Dakota, or to the manner of the resolution, or to the manner of the investigation, but I do not think it is a fair thing for the Senator to ask that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, consisting of 11 Senators, shall sit under the absolute direction of this body to investigate charges made anonymously, the truth or falsity of which could be ascertained in ten minutes at the Post-Office Department. If we are called upon to do that, it will mean the expenditure of a great deal of money; it will mean the sending for and swearing of witnesses; it will mean the employment of stenographers; it will mean the printing of a report; and then, a thousand to one, it will amount to nothing whatever when you come to the end of it but a tissue of charges that will not stand investigation.

I know that the Washington Times is honestly and fearlessly and intelligently conducting an important investigation, but it may be misinformed; and I know the Senator from South Dakota is earnestly desirous of lifting up labor and its interests, but the Senator from South Dakota must see that it goes almost to the verge of impropriety upon an anonymous charge to ask 11 Senators to sit week after week to investigate charges of this kind. If the anonymous statements contained in every newspaper in the country were brought to Congress and made the basis of requests that the standing committees of the Senate should investigate them, we should be able to do nothing else but conduct such investigations.

I suggest that the Senator from South Dakota, most important to the other side of the Chamber, should investigate the alleged misconduct of a Democratic Postmaster-General, and if he finds these gross charges to be true—which I do not for a moment believe—that he withdraw his countenance and support from the other side of the Chamber, which he seems willingly to have recently lent.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to say that the Senator from Colorado is beating on the wrong track when he says the Senator from South Dakota is not informed in regard to what he is talking about.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Did not the Senator disclaim any knowledge except that received from a newspaper article?

Mr. KYLE. I did not intend to do so if I made the remark. The attention of the Senator from South Dakota was first called to the subject by an editorial in the Washington Times, but I wish to say that the editorials in the Times are not anonymous communications. They are the editorials of a man the equal of the Senator from Colorado, who occupied a position of prominence as a member of the House of Representatives only a year or two ago—Mr. Conn, who has a bank account sufficient to substantiate the statements he makes if charges are brought against him.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that if the editor has a bank account he is superior to the Senator from Colorado. [Laughter.]

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, if any charges are brought against the gentleman I am sure he will be able to take care of them.

In regard to this subject I wish to state that it is not merely a question of hearsay upon the part of the Times. It is a question which has been agitated among the employees of this institution now for a number of weeks. Scores of the poor women employed there have gone to Mr. Neilson, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and have implored him to take the matter into consideration and put them back again upon work by the day.

In reply to the Senator's suggestion about my going to the Postmaster-General and asking him for information upon the question, let me say if the Postmaster-General were here to-day he would also have demanded an investigation by the Post-Office Committee. It is right that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General should also demand an investigation.

As to Mr. James Taylor, who has been referred to, I will say that he is a perfectly reputable man in the city of Brooklyn, and I have not a particle of doubt as to the authenticity of the telegram or as to the facts communicated in it. If the Senator from Colorado has any doubt as to the facts stated in the telegram he should be one of the very first of the members of the committee to demand an investigation, and let us know if there is any doubt as to the mail sacks being made by convict labor.

There is not a single point made by the Senator from Colorado, so far as I can see, which is worthy of an answer. The Senator from Colorado, I believe, is a member of the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. He is chairman of that committee.

Mr. KYLE. The Senator from Colorado, I am now informed, is the chairman of the Post-Office Committee. I did not know that before.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will state to the Senator from South Dakota that it was because I am chairman of the committee that I called attention to the matter.

Mr. KYLE. Perhaps the Senator does not like to work. Perhaps that may be the reason for his objection to the resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that because I was chairman of the committee I called the attention of the Senate to the character of his resolution, and I will say to the Senator that I do not like this kind of work, because it seems to be entirely unnecessary and uncalled for, not alone for myself, but for my ten associates on the committee. That was the reason of my objection.

Mr. KYLE. I think the Senator from Colorado ought to be all the more willing to vindicate the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General if he is at the head of that committee.

Mr. President, I do not think that Senators should raise any objection to the passage of the resolution. It merely asks, in the first place, that the committee shall investigate the facts so as to determine whether these women are working for the Government upon starvation wages, and whether sweat-shop practices are being introduced in the Government service; and, if the charges are found to be true, to make recommendation by bill or otherwise that these women be placed back upon the old pay allowance of $1.50 or $1.75 a day.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I wish to say in relation to the information which the Senator has regarding the contract system to which he refers, under which it is alleged the mail bags of the Post-Office Department have been made under contract by convict labor, that that is a matter which can not in any way be controlled by the Department. As I understand, there is no law prohibiting such contracts; but there is a law which requires that all bids shall be made after public advertisement and that the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. So, if the fact is as has been suggested by the Senator from South Dakota, it would be beyond the power of the Postmaster-General to control it under the law as it exists to-day.

As to the other charges which have been made, I admit that they are serious in character. They are formidable as presented and read here from the Washington Times by the Senator from South Dakota. They are so serious that, after having those editorials and communications by the reporters of that paper read, I feel, bearing the relations I do to the Postmaster-General, that it would be but fair to him, fair to the Senate, and fair to myself that the Senator from South Dakota should allow the resolution to go over until to-morrow, not losing its place, so that I can make some investigation, and so that whatever goes before the committee to-morrow may go before it with the facts stated from official sources. I appeal, therefore, to the Senator to yield to that suggestion.

Mr. KYLE. I will state that it is now just about 2 o'clock, when the morning hour will cease, and I shall be very glad indeed to have the resolution go over, without losing its place, so that it may be taken up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota, was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. NELSON, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 4960) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 102) authorizing the wearing of the distinctive badge adopted by the Sons of Veterans, United States Army, upon all occasions of ceremony, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CIVIL-SERVICE CORRESPONDENCE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE January 28, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission be directed to furnish the Senate with all correspondence respecting the enforcement of the civil-service law between the Public Printer and said Commission between the dates of July 1, 1895, and November 1, 1895, with a detailed statement of all matters pertaining thereto, together with the correspondence between certain discharged employees of the Government Printing Office and said Commission between July 1, 1895, and November 1, 1895.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 2904.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, on which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I shall make no apology for doing what is my right here, to exercise the functions of a Senator and discuss the issues presented to the Senate. I know, sir, that custom has made it a rule that new members of this body should listen rather than be heard, and my brief experience—and while in the city I have been very attentive upon the sessions of the Senate—has shown me that the custom is a wise one, because new men who come in here, especially those who, like myself, have had little, in fact no legislative experience, realize very soon that what they do not know about the affairs of this great Government is far more than they do know or can hope to learn without much labor.

My experience has been in a different arena. I am a farmer, pure and simple, with no collateral occupation. The speeches that I have made have been upon the hustings, out in the open air under the trees, before the common masses of the country, where men are allowed, if they feel disposed, to applaud the utterances of the orator. I find here that the Senate considers it beneath its dignity to applaud anybody, and the galleries are reprimanded severely if they break over the rule and indicate that they approve something that has been said. I find further that no matter how well pleased men are with what is being said—I mean Senators, for I look upon those in the galleries as muzzled automatons merely, you know—the rule is to Gorgonize the speaker with a Senatorial stare, and turn him into stone almost. What has been the result? I find that men eminent in our history, whose speeches are read all over the country, get up here like schoolboys and read essays in a monotone to empty chairs, when the Senate of the United States, supposed to be in session, has gone to the cloakrooms or somewhere else.

Now, sir, this could not have been the purpose and the idea of the creators of the Senate, the fathers who framed the Constitution. This grand deliberative assemblage, the grandest in the world, must have been designed by those who framed the Constitution to be a deliberative body where the ablest men of the country, representing sovereign States, would meet together in council and listen to each other's arguments and the presentation of facts and base their action thereon. But what are we? The mere servants of party, bound hand and foot by the feeling that we must obey the behest of party conventions; and those who speak at all—and God knows there is enough speaking or reading—speak merely for home consumption and to have their constituents read what they have said and what Uncle Sam sends out free through the mails under the frank of the Honorable This or the Honorable That.

Tako any able speech that has been made here—and there have been many made since I have been here—who reads it? Speeches do not get into the newspapers except in a garbled shape. A Senator sends them home to his State. If a speech is eloquent, very cogent, his fellow-Senators subscribe for a few hundred or a few thousand copies, which they send out, and the eloquence and the logic and the argument which it has taken the Senator months to prepare are buried in the records in our archives. His words do not reach the citizens of other States; especially do they not reach the citizens of the party to which he does not belong.

How much of this, Mr. President, is due to self-complacency, to the feeling among you—I hardly feel prepared yet to say among us—that you are the Senate? How much of this so-called Senatorial dignity of which we hear so much and see so much is worthy of preservation? It hangs over this Chamber like a wet blanket; it smothers down independent action; it obliterates the man, and we are here the puppets, the cogs in the wheel of party, to do the bidding of the manipulators of the party machines. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. TILLMAN. Speeches here change no votes. There is not a man on this floor who on any question affecting his party has ever been budged one inch from his position by a speech from a man on the other side. Even though his reason was convinced he felt that he must obey the behest of the party to which he belonged.

Now, sir, while I in part represent South Carolina on this floor, I have a higher conception of my duty than to feel or believe that South Carolina's interests only are in my keeping. I am an American Senator. I have one vote out of ninety which deal with the lives and liberties and property of the people of this country, and unless I discharge my duty in a conscientious manner and from a broad and patriotic standpoint, rising above local prejudices and interests to consider the interests of the entire country, I am unworthy of a seat here.

So far as I know I am the only farmer, pure and simple, in this august body. Yet out of the 70,000,000 people in this country, 35,000,000 are engaged in agricultural pursuits alone. If, tnen, one farmer has broken down the barriers and forced his way here, upon his head rests the responsibility of giving utterance to the feelings, the aspirations of his fellows, and of giving utterance to the sense of wrong which they have. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel constrained to-day to raise my voice to speak, and before I get through you will realize the fact that I speak plainly and bluntly and use Anglo-Saxon, the vernacular, the language of the common people; for I am one of them and I expect to tell you how they feel, and what they think, and what they want.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the other day that the question of the free coinage of silver is old straw, that it has been thrashed and thrashed and thrashed; that there is nothing new in it. It has been thrashed, sir, by lawyers; it has been thrashed by railroad magnates; it has been thrashed by the president of this corporation and the attorney of that corporation. It has not been handled on the pitchfork of a farmer. I am here to see if I can not get a few grains more wheat—of truth—in the handling of the question. Farmers use a pitchfork in handling straw, therefore the simile is good if the statement is good. They also use pitchforks to handle manure, and perhaps I shall find some of that in my pathway before I get through.

Of course, the novelty of a farmer pretending to talk finance or to understand the question is so great that most of my colleagues are doing me the honor, I believe for the first time this session, to sit here and listen to me. I thank you, gentlemen, that you have not adjourned and gone off. Whether I shall repay your curiosity or not I can not say. Two things, though, I can promise you: First, that I will try to tell the truth as I see it; and the other is that when I get through, I shall stop. That is not a virtue of many of those who have spoken here, because they have run around a circle, traveling like a kitten following its tail, and have simply tired their fellows out, and they had to leave for self-protection. [Laughter.]

The wise man said long ago that "there is nothing new under the sun," and, of course, those who have been here for years, who have heard these old questions of the tariff and finances talked over and spoken about for months and months and years, feel so tired and worn out and disgusted that the mere names of finance and tariff give them a tired feeling.

What is the position of the Republican party as set forth by its acknowledged leader, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]? I am sorry he is not here. How did he set it forth in his speech on the 3d of January? What did he propose to do? He said that the present trouble with the finances of the country arise from a deficit in the revenues, and the remedy is to issue more bonds and tax the people. That is all—increase the tariff in order to increase the revenues and issue bonds to pay the deficit and get the gold reserve straight, and we will all be happy. That is the Republican policy. They do not propose any other scheme of relief at this time.

What is the policy outlined by the leader, as you say, on this side, the man who lives at the other end of the Avenue? His policy is more bonds, no increase of revenue—he has enough revenue just now—retire all the greenbacks, all the silver certificates, and perhaps the national banks may graciously come in and fill the void by issuing notes.

In what respect do they differ? Mr. SHERMAN wants coin bonds; Mr. Cleveland wants gold bonds. Mr. SHERMAN wants a higher tariff; Mr. Cleveland wants the present tariff. Mr. SHERMAN, as a means of relief to stop the endless chain—which is a patent contrivance, with thieves at one end and dishonest officials at the other, to rob the American people—wants to keep the redeemed greenbacks in the Treasury, so no one can get them to raid the Treasury, while the President says that the only refuge he sees is to redeem, to blot out, and issue bonds in place of every solitary piece of paper that circulates without interest. And both of them mean contraction, lower prices, harder times.

Neither of them tell us what is to bring relief. Mr. SHERMAN—I will read from his speech presently—does give what he considers a comprehensive, a good scheme for future use; mind you, not now. The whole idea appears to be that a promise of this Government which is a mortgage on the labor of this country for thirty years to come is better than a promise of this Government without interest, which circulates as money in the everyday affairs of the people. Now, I ask any man here who has a scintilla of honesty in his heart or in his brain to tell me the difference between the promises of this Government; and if one of them, which would relieve the people, is good, being to-day at a premium, in the name of fairness and honesty, why should they wish to retire greenbacks and put out another promise that will bear interest? In whose interest is such a scheme brought here but that of the moneyed classes, who are to-day rolling in wealth? The idea is to sink deeper in the bog of pauperism and poverty the sweating, toiling masses, the farmers, and other laborers, who are to pay the interest and redeem the bonds at some future time, possibly.

I saw in the Arena the article which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] quoted in his speech, but deeming it too long for my purposes, and also fearing that the figures might be wrong, I obtained the official documents and prepared a table showing just what this system has cost us. In 1866 the national debt was $2,636,000,000 in round numbers. At that time cotton was worth 43 cents a pound, and it would have taken 12,940,000 bales to pay the entire debt. Wheat was $2.36 a bushel, and it would have taken 1,116,000,000 bushels to have paid the national debt. It may be said that that is not fair, because the inflation just after the war, the unsettled condition, the impoverished and war-wounded condition of the South caused cotton to be abnormally high. Then come down to 1873, when silver was demonetized. The public debt had been reduced to $2,105,000,000; cotton was worth 20 cents, and notwithstanding the reduction of $500,000,000 in the debt it would have taken 22,000,000 bales of cotton to pay it, nearly double what it would have taken at the end of the war. Wheat was worth $1.56, and it would have taken 1,349,000,000 bushels of wheat to pay the debt—upward of 200,000,000 bushels more, notwithstanding the reduction.

Come to 1879, when specie payments were resumed. Cotton was then worth 10 cents, and the debt was $1,996,000,000. It would have taken 39,000,000 bales of cotton to pay it. Wheat was worth $1.21, and it would have taken 1,649,000,000 bushels to pay it, notwithstanding the reduction. Come down to 1894 and add in the last infamous issue of $162,000,000 of bonds; put that on top of the debt. The public debt was $889,000,000; cotton was worth 7 cents, and it would have taken in 1894, 25,000,000 bales of cotton to pay the debt, more than double the amount it would have taken at the close of the war. Wheat was worth 61 cents, and it would have taken 1,474,000,000 bushels to pay it.

We have struggled, we have delved and plowed—and we furnish nearly all of your exports—during the entire time we have paid in interest and principal on the national debt $3,914,000,000, at an average of 12 cents a pound for cotton, 63,000,000 bales; at an average of $1.25 for wheat, 3,131,000,000 bushels of wheat, and to-day, after all these payments, in the words of the poet, we "drag at each remove a lengthening chain," with a ball at the end of it or a bondholder straddle of it; and to-day it will take more of the products of the farm to liquidate the national debt than it would have taken when the war closed.

I will insert a table giving the figures in detail:

Year.	Debt, interest-bearing and noninterest-bearing, less cash in Treasury.	Debt could have been paid in bales of cotton of 500 pounds each.	Average price of cotton.	Debt could have been paid in bushels of wheat.	Average price of wheat.
1866	$2,636,036,164	12,940,020	$0.43	1,116,922,103	$2.36
1879	1,996,414,905	39,928,298	.10	1,649,929,673	1.21
Paid in principal and interest since 1866	3,914,424,855	65,240,414	.12	3,131,539,884	1.25

Now, after criticising others for reading essays, I know you will laugh at me, but I got just a little bit frightened, and to keep from saying hard things in an unparliamentary way I took the precaution to prepare a little essay of my own. I hope that you will patiently listen while I endeavor to read it.

It is not saying too much, and I feel warranted in charging that the derangement in our finances and all this cry about sound money and maintaining the credit and honor of the United States, are all part and parcel of a damnable scheme of robbery, which had for its object, first, the utter destruction of silver as a money metal; second, the increase of the public debt by the issue of bonds payable in gold; and third, the surrender to corporations of the power to issue all paper money and give them a monopoly of that function.

After the enactment of the Sherman law in 1890 it was supposed that the price of silver would rise and the ratio between the two metals, as bullion, would be approximately restored to the legal ratio. That law has been defined by the Senator from Ohio as a "makeshift to keep down free coinage." The Democratic platform denounced it as a "makeshift" for free coinage; and the silver Republicans—mind you, instead of this Senate being divided up and down that way [indicating], it is getting divided across this way [indicating]; thank God, for we of the South on this side have been down below, under the heels of oppression, and we are glad to find that west of the Mississippi the "galled jade winces," and that the collar of servitude which has been fastened around our necks and has been there for thirty years is beginning to make your shoulders raw—the silver Republicans, who had been bamboozled into accepting it as a compromise, hoping that it would provide for the absorption of the entire American silver product, found themselves overreached and deceived. It can not be denied that the object of the law was to increase the price of silver and restore its parity, and this must be borne in mind when we come to discuss its provisions. While the struggle was going on in Congress between the silver and anti-silver forces, and it was thought probable that the free-coinage bill would pass, silver steadily rose in the markets of the world, and it did not begin to decline until a month after the passage of the bill, at which time it was 117—within 12 cents of the ratio of 16 to 1.

I desire to call especial attention to this fact as an answer to the assertion, so freely made and so often repeated by gold-bug papers and orators, that legislation does not affect the price of silver, and that we would sink to a silver basis alongside of Mexico, China, and Japan, and have only 50-cent dollars, if silver were restored to its place alongside of gold. That is a stock argument. We have heard it this week right here in this Chamber. It will come in here next week. It will come in here whenever anybody gets up to speak on the other side.

But when it was seen that this country was still controlled by monometallists the price of silver began to drop, and went down, down, down, below even the price which ruled before the enactment of the Sherman law. There was still discrimination against the white metal; it did not have free coinage as gold, but it was a commodity, not a money. It was discriminated against by legislative enactment, and hence the fall. The silver Republicans of the West, who had deserted the silver Democrats of the South and accepted the compromise offered by Senator SHERMAN, may take warning as to what faith or trust they can put in any utterances or actions of the Senator from Ohio as to legislation in regard to our finances. If they are honest in their assertions that they feel the welfare of their States and the welfare of the masses of the people depend upon the restoration of silver to equality with gold, they should be prepared to cross the Rubicon and fight this battle to a finish, under whatever banner shall promise victory and relief. Partisan political affiliations and sectional feeling no doubt largely influenced their action in 1890. The time for another Presidential election approaches. They must understand that the election of any man to the Presidency who would veto a free-coinage bill means defeat. It means more; it means continued disaster to our industries and increased poverty to the masses of our people.

But let me return to the question of the conspiracy. An examination of the tables in the report of the Treasurer giving the net gold in the Treasury will show that under the Sherman law there was a diminution of the amount of free gold in a gradually decreasing scale, but not enough to cause any alarm. During the entire year of 1891 and entire year of 1892 there was approximately as much gold as there was during the years 1884 and 1885. The exact figures are as follows:

Average for the twelve months of 1884, $135,951,036.
Average for the twelve months of 1885, $129,554,162.
Average for the twelve months of 1891, $133,824,344.
Average for the twelve months of 1892, $117,472,893.

There existed then no just cause for uneasiness concerning the credit of the United States at the time of the last Presidential election.

If the secret history of the year 1892 shall ever be written, it will disclose the fact, which can not be proven now, but of which I have not the slightest doubt, that the gold ring of New York, which embraces nearly all the bankers in the Eastern and Middle States and the stock gamblers of Wall street, controlled the Presidential nominations of both the Democratic and Republican parties and had an understanding with the managers, or with both the candidates themselves, in regard to what policy should be pursued toward our finances. They contributed money for the booming of Mr. Cleveland as the only available Democratic candidate, and they abused and ridiculed every other Democratic aspirant. Anyone who was present during the Democratic convention at Chicago could see that there was a large band of organized boomers in the lobby of the Palmer House, where they kept up such a noise and racket that one would have thought that pandemonium had broken loose and all the demons of hell had collected in one group to shout for "Grover." Mr. Cleveland was undoubtedly very strong with the mass of the people, and his patriotic and sympathetic utterances, during his first Administration, in behalf of the agricultural classes gave him great strength; but there is no doubt that money was used lavishly, and that there were pledges made in regard to the distribution of patronage as a means of controlling delegates and securing votes.

There was plain evidence to show that the President himself had weakened on the question of tariff reform, and the financial plank was cunningly drafted so as to satisfy both gold and silver men, with the intention that it should be interpreted, if Cleveland was elected, as meaning the cessation of silver coinage and the forcing of a gold standard upon the people. Interpreted according to the plain use and meaning of English words, the platform means bimetallism, but there are conditions and ambiguous phrases which have afforded an excuse to the elastic conscience of the bull-headed and self-idolatrous man who holds the reins of power to pursue the policy he has. Whether the scheme was agreed to by the President in person or not and whether he bound himself in plain terms or not will, perhaps, never be known. His course has been unswerving in the absolute contradiction of his public professions and letter of acceptance. The expectations and interests of the people have been forgotten and ignored. The party which elected him has been betrayed, and its banners which floated so triumphantly in the breezes of 1892 now trail in the dust of disgrace and defeat. The practical destruction of the party has been accomplished. As a proof of it, while the national convention is only six months off, there is no one prominently mentioned as its candidate for the Presidency. No one seems willing to offer himself as a vicarious sacrifice on the altar of a disgraced and dishonored party. The Republicans, who had been defeated by such an overwhelming vote at the last Presidential election, are now in possession of the other branch of Congress by a majority unknown to our history, except during and immediately after the war. They are there not because there has been an increase in the Republican vote, but because hundreds of thousands of disgusted Democrats have stayed at home and let the election go by default.

There was no trouble with the gold reserve and no hint of any loss of confidence in the national credit until about the time of the Presidential election. While the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, was contemplating the probabilities of a deficit in the revenue, the raiding of the Treasury by withdrawing gold did not begin until after Cleveland's election.

There were withdrawals of gold in the regular order of business, but the endless chain had not begun to work.

We then, for the first time, got a glimpse of the conspiracy of which I have spoken. Mr. Foster gave the holders of greenbacks and Treasury notes the option of having Government paper cashed in gold or silver, and as they all demanded gold, the gold in the Treasury rapidly ran down. The financial papers took up the cry of the country going to a silver basis, and the first premonitory breezes of the panic of 1893 swept over the land. While there were no reasonable causes to produce distrust, the conspirators fomented it by every means possible and set in motion the machinery of the newspapers which they control, to terrorize the business interests of the country and make ready for the "object lesson" which Mr. Cleveland told us was coming. It was expected by the confiding Democracy that the installation of the new Administration would witness a change of policy. The trust in the President was very great, and, remembering how he had shipwrecked the party in 1888 by his Quixotic tariff message and the emphatic indorsement which he had given to the platform adopted at Chicago, the silver Democrats had reason to expect that he had learned some wisdom and that the Government would exercise its option to pay its obligations in coin, either gold or silver, for its own protection.

The Republicans have stressed the fact in their arguments on this floor that the gold reserve never fell below a hundred millions until after Harrison vacated the Executive office; but it must not be forgotten that they had set the example, had broken the slender prop which had started the avalanche, and, instead of endeavoring to stem the tide of ruin and redeem the pledges of the Democratic party to give the people relief, President Cleveland lent aid and comfort to the conspirators by his utterances and official actions in continuing the policy of his predecessor.

The people by their votes had demanded a change from the Republican policy. A Democratic President gave them a change for the worse by encouraging his moneyed friends, who controlled the newspapers and thus directed the current of public opinion, to hurry up their operations of robbery by means of the panic and to accelerate the downward progress of the country.

We had fondly hoped for relief and every Democrat was supremely happy.

I came up here as governor of my State and stood out in the cold around here on East Capitol street for four hours, nearly frozen to death, to be present at the jollification and glorification upon the inauguration of a Democratic President, with a Democratic Senate and Democratic House, and God forgive me for being such a fool! [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Chair would admonish the galleries that under the rules of the Senate manifestations of applause or dissent are not permitted, and if it recurs the Chair will be under the necessity of enforcing the rules.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to have the Senate suspend its rules, and you, of course, must enforce them; but if you will just let me down into the bog and quagmire of Senatorial dignity gently—of nobody saying anything when I speak—I will get used to it after a while, I hope.

We, I say, we Democrats, had fondly hoped for relief. We elected a President to give the people bread and he gave them only stones. While it is familiar to every Senator, I must ask your indulgence while I quote the financial plank of the Chicago platform. But I suppose you have all heard it a hundred and fifty times here and know it by heart, and, therefore, I shall not read it, but just incorporate it in my remarks:

We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman Act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, to be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin. We insist upon this policy as especially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseless victims of unstable money and a fluctuating currency.

Now, here is an extract from the address of Mr. Cleveland in response to the committee of notification:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: The message you deliver from the national Democracy arouses within me emotions which would be well-nigh overwhelming if I did not recognize here assembled the representatives of a great party who must share with me the responsibility your mission invites. I find much relief in the reflection that I have been selected merely—to stand for the principles and purposes to which my party is pledged, and for the enforcement and supremacy of which all who have any right to claim Democratic fellowship must constantly and persistently labor.

Again, in the same speech, he said:

I shall not attempt to specify at this time other objects and aims of Democratic endeavor which add inspiration to our mission. True to its history and its creed, our party will respond to the wants of the people within safe lines and guided by enlightened statesmanship. To the troubled and impatient within our membership—

I was one of them. Thank God, I did all I could to keep him from being nominated, but like a royal and true servant of the party, after he had got the nomination, fairly or unfairly, I went home and restrained those who were eager to join the Populists, and South Carolina polled only 2,400 votes for Weaver. I went in the ditch at Chicago with Tammany. Where now is the chieftain of Tammany? I know he has a keen blade, and I do not intend to challenge him to get up here and swipe my head off. I have seen him unhorse and penetrate the armor of so many since I have been here that I dread any encounter with him. Therefore you may consider that withdrawn. It is not in the manuscript of my remarks. [Laughter.]

I go back to Mr. Cleveland. He said:

To the troubled and imatient within our membership we commend continued, unswerving allegiance to the party whose principles in all times past have been found sufficient for them, and whose aggregate wisdom and patriotism, their experience teaches, can always be trusted.

In a tone of partisanship which befits the occasion, let me say to you, as equal partners in the campaign upon which we to-day enter, that the personal fortunes of those to whom you have intrusted your banners are only important as they are related to the fate of the principles they represent and to the party which they lead.

I watched for these utterances, because if he had evinced or shown any purpose of treachery I would have tried to deliver the vote of South Carolina to some other man. Therefore, feeling a personal grievance in the man's action, I am here to-day to arraign him before the American people for his misdeeds, and before the party for his treachery, and to ask for a verdict.

There is not one word here which would warrant one to expect that the leader of the Democratic party, its head and guide, would ignore the platform and treat with contempt the trusted lieutenants whom the people had sent to the national capital to assist in shaping the party's policy. The language would lead us to expect the very reverse. How many of these reasonable expectations have been met? How many of you, men grown old and gray in the service of the party and of the nation, men who were its trusted leaders before this man from Buffalo was ever heard of, how many, I say, have been called into his councils? Speak, if there be any here; I shall be glad to hear them. Where has this man sunk his personality? Whom has he consulted? Whom has he recognized? Whose advice has he followed? None but that of the bootlicks and sycophants, who have crawled on their knees for the crumbs of patronage and betrayed their constituents for the offices in his gift.

In the entire history of this country the high office of President has never been so prostituted, and never has the appointing power been so abused. Claiming to be the apostle of civil-service reform, he has debauched the civil service by making appointments only of those whose sponsors would surrender their manhood, and, with bated breath, walk with submissive head in his presence. With relentless purpose he has ignored his oath of office to uphold and obey the law, and has paid out gold instead of coin and issued bonds to buy more gold, by both actions overriding the law, and giving no heed to the interests of any but his moneyed friends—I might say his owners or partners.

Whatever claim of legality may be put forward for the redemption of Treasury notes in gold, there can be none as to the redemption of greenbacks in anything but coin; and the option was given him to redeem the Treasury notes in either gold or silver. While to this besotted tyrant coin has come to mean gold alone, he can not by his mere "ipse dixit" change the law of this land and pervert the plain meaning of the English language. He has sold bonds to buy gold with which to redeem greenbacks when there was a large quantity of silver in the Treasury which, according to law, should have been used, and the law only authorized the sale of bonds for coin. His Republican predecessors and allies who set the unrighteous and unlawful example which he has so persistently followed, and encouraged him in it and still encourage him to the utmost extent, can not escape the condemnation of the honest, working, business men of the country as equal partners in his guilt.

The repeal of the Sherman law, which was the first point of attack of this unholy alliance, was only accomplished through the aid and in conjunction with a majority of the Republican Senators, and this Democratic President so-called, accomplished what was not possible for any Republican Executive under the circumstances to have brought about. A change of the party in power had left a large number of offices in his gift with which to buy votes. Harrison would have had no such advantage. The Democratic party had demanded a repeal of the entire Sherman law as a makeshift for free coinage. But that would have cut this so-called endless chain. The parity clause was absolutely necessary to give excuse and color to a demand for the retirement of the greenbacks as a means of stopping the "issue of unending bonds." So they repealed only so much of it as suited their purposes.

But let us consider what the honest meaning of "parity" in the Sherman law was and is. What is the meaning of "parity" as given in the dictionary? The language is:

To maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law.

Now, if I should lie down on this floor, my head and feet would be on a parity so far as the floor is concerned. If I stand up, my body is still on the floor, but my head is up here and my feet down there. The head in this instance represents gold, the feet silver, and that is the parity which this paragon of Presidents has given us.

It did not say the parity of coin, mind you, meaning the coined dollar. It said the parity of the metals, the ratio of 16 to 1. The words could not mean that upon one metal was to be imposed the duty of holding up the other and of redeeming by itself the paper dollars based on both or on silver alone.

The object was to have them assist each other; to hold silver up by holding gold down, and an honest Secretary of the Treasury, who should have resigned his office rather than submit to the dictation of a besotted chief, would have paid out silver to protect the Treasury from the gold gamblers and bond grabbers, as the law and his oath of office required. But, alas! the old breed of Southern statesmen like Calhoun, who, after a life spent in the public service, had to be buried at public expense and his debts paid by the State of South Carolina, appear to be passing away. No wonder the Senator from Massachusetts feels warranted in twitting us with the decay of Southern statesmanship and charging us with dishonesty.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me. Does he allude to what I said the other day?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I made no such intimation. Another Southern Senator seemed to have understood me in the same way.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish I had the Senator's words here. I did have them, but I did not imagine that anybody could misunderstand their plain and palpable meaning. If you will let me get through, perhaps you will be satisfied with what I am going to say.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to put myself right in this matter, because I said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; I do not want to do any Senator injustice.

Mr. HOAR. I have not before me the exact language I used, but I said in substance, speaking wholly of the change of opinion, "What has become of the old Southern statesmen who were the especial champions of hard money?"

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a minute.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. Which is the harder of the two, silver or gold?

Mr. HOAR. That is another proposition. I wish to state what I said. I had not the remotest idea of intimating that there was any degeneracy or inferiority in the present Southern statesmen as compared with the past. I referred only to the change of opinion.

Mr. TILLMAN. If any Senator has the RECORD of January 3, will he please turn to the Senator's remarks for me, and I will read them.

Mr. HOAR. I will find it for the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, sir, I want to do you exact justice.

Mr. HOAR. Go on. I will find it for you.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I will stop right now. [A page placed a glass of water on his desk.] I never wet my whistle when I am talking, because I can not run a windmill on water. [Laughter.] I will wait. [A pause.]

Mr. HOAR. I have the extract here, and I will read it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I said:

What has become of the old Democratic party? What has become of the old statesmanship of the South? Whatever else we may have to charge against the people of that section in times past, if we have anything, one thing until lately it always stood for, freedom from debt, economy of expenditure, and sound and honest money, gold and silver. Now, I am sorry to say, with some honorable exceptions, the statesmanship of that part of the country seems to have abandoned all three.

Mr. TILLMAN. "Honest money!" You have chunked us with that infernal phrase until we have got raw under it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. If the honorable Senator from South Carolina will pardon me, what I rose to correct him in was not whether I used the phrase "honest money" accurately or not. That is another question. The charge that I imputed something of degeneracy or dishonor to the present representatives of the South on this floor, as compared with their predecessors, I absolutely deny. I have read the language, which will stand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very glad indeed to have the Senator withdraw any such imputation.

Mr. HOAR. I do not withdraw any; I never made any.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a question of the interpretation of your language, and I interpreted in the way I have, and felt called upon to answer it in the way I did.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I propose to put my own interpretation on my own language, and I suppose the honorable Senator from South Carolina will accept my assurance of what I myself meant by it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do. I exonerate the Senator from any intended insult to the Southern people, but we want to put our interpretation on the English language as to what "honest" means. The word "honesty," if you will pardon me, as applied to money nowadays means that those of us who favor silver are dishonest. We deny it. The country has had silver since its birth as a part of its constitutional money up to 1873. Since the days of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob the two metals have been money until within the last twenty-five years.

I will go on, and I hope I will not tread on my aged friend's toes any more. [Laughter.] It seems impossible for South Carolina to get into this Chamber without Massachusetts getting hold of her. This time South Carolina got hold of Massachusetts, it seems. [Laughter.]

He charges dishonesty, however, in another connection—as the aider and abettor of this Judas from Kentucky, who, after a brilliant career of twenty years and more as leader and champion of the silver forces, has, in his old age, come to this pitiful pass. And then to think that the indictment thus brought against a whole section should have so much color of truth and of fact to back it up, in the apostacy from their principles of the two other Secretaries from the South in the Cabinet of a President who has so disgraced the name of Democracy!

The South bows its head in shame at this exhibition of moral cowardice and despises the renegades; but I must remind the Senator from Massachusetts that there is as yet only moral turpitude and treachery to be charged against these men. I would not have said this if the Senator had chosen his language more carefully. It is here, however, and in it must go. The Southern Congressmen and Senators who came here poor, are still poor. They have not become millionaires like some of their Northern brethren; and there is no Credit Mobilier steal, or Colfax scandal, or Belknap bribery chargeable to any Southern men. Let him remember these things and keep back his sneers and taunts.

So, if the Senator wants to charge the Southern people, through their representatives here, with being dishonest, or if he does not want to charge them with it and chooses to withdraw the imputation to-day, let him remember these facts before he again makes such a statement.

Mr. President, if there has been one idea more persistently and prominently presented to the American people by President Cleveland than any other, it has been the iniquities of the tariff and the demand for its revision. In season and out of season, with "damnable iteration," he has sung this siren song in the ears of the farmers. Listen to this paragraph from his message of 1888:

A century has passed. Our cities are the abiding places of wealth and luxury; our manufactories yield fortunes never dreamed of by the fathers of the Republic; our business men are madly striving in the race for riches, and immense aggregations of capital outrun the imagination in the magnitude of their undertakings.

We view with pride and satisfaction this bright picture of our country's growth and prosperity, while only a closer scrutiny develops a somber shading. Upon more careful inspection we find the wealth and luxury of our cities mingled with poverty and wretchedness and unremunerative toil. A crowded and constantly increasing urban population suggests the impoverishment of rural sections and discontent with agricultural pursuits. The farmer's son, not satisfied with his father's simple and laborious life, joins the eager chase for easily acquired wealth.

We discover that the fortunes realized by our manufacturers are no longer solely the reward of sturdy industry and enlightened foresight, but that they result from the discriminating favor of the Government, and are largely built upon undue exactions from the masses of our people. The gulf between employers and the employed is constantly widening, and classes are rapidly forming, one comprising the very rich and powerful, while in another are found the toiling poor.

As we view the achievements of aggregated capital, we discover the existence of trusts, combinations, and monopolies, while the citizen is struggling far in the rear, or is trampled to death beneath an iron heel. Corporations, which should be carefully restrained creatures of the law and the servants of the people, are fast becoming the people's masters.

Here I pause to interpolate again the assertion of my belief that during the four years that he was President, from 1885 to 1889, and since he came in again in 1893, he has never had by the hand a simple, square, straight, honest toiler in the field. He knows nothing about farmers, and, more's the pity, he cares nothing about them.

And listen to this:

Our farmers, long suffering and patient, struggling in the race of life with hardest and most unremitting toil, will not fail to see, in spite of misrepresentations and misleading fallacies, that they are obliged to accept such prices for their products as are fixed in foreign markets, where they compete with the farmers of the world; that their lands are declining in value while their debts increase; and that, without compensating favor, they are forced by the action of the Government to pay, for the benefit of others, such enhanced prices for things that they need that the scanty returns of their labor fail to furnish their support or leave no margin for accumulation.

I will pause for a minute here to change the phraseology of the above paragraph, so that it will illustrate with telling emphasis the argument I will use. Let it read as follows:

They, the farmers, are forced by the action of the Government to receive, for the benefit of others, such low prices for the things they sell that the scanty returns of their labor fail to furnish their support or leave no margin for accumulation.

They are burning our candle at both ends, crushing us on one hand with the tariff and robbing us on the other hand with the gold standard, and they have asked us, like beasts of burden, like dumb driven cattle, to bear these things and say nothing, but to vote the party ticket.

The gold standard is responsible for it, and no honest or sane man can deny it.

We can bear any reasonable tariff and prosper under a double standard; and the community of interest between manufacturing and agriculture was never more clearly shown. We want no addition to the producers of wheat, cotton, and other farm products. We want a market for these products, at a fair price, which would enable us to start the factories to running and give work to the hundreds of thousands of idle men and women. Now we can not buy of them because we have no money left to buy with.

To return to Mr. Cleveland. In reading these eloquent and truthful words we farmers were lost in admiration of this man's honesty and courage, for they were true and doubtless honest when uttered. And listen to this from his message of 1887:

In the present state of legislation the only pretense of any existing Executive power to restore, at this time, any part of our surplus revenues to the people by its expenditure, consists in the supposition that the Secretary of the Treasury may enter the market and purchase bonds of the Government not yet due, at a rate of premium to be agreed upon. The only provision of law from which such a power could be derived is found in an appropriation bill passed a number of years ago; and it is subject to the suspicion that it was intended as temporary and limiting in its application, instead of conferring a continuing discretion and authority. No condition ought to exist which would justify the grant of power to a single official, upon his judgment of its necessity, to withhold from or release to the business of the people, in an unusual manner, money held in the Treasury, and thus affect, at his will, the financial condition of the country; and if it is deemed wise to lodge in the Secretary of the Treasury the authority in the present juncture to purchase bonds, it should be plainly vested, and provided, as far as possible, with such checks and limitations as will define this official's right and discretion and at the same time relieve him from undue responsibility.

I quote it for the purpose of pointing out the evolution of a tyrant and of showing the transition from a conscientious law-abiding Chief Magistrate to an arrogant and obstinate ruler who ignores the law and issues bonds at will, and issues them under a statute that is "subject to the suspicion that it was intended to be temporary and limited in its application instead of conferring a discretionary authority." He not only issues them, but does it secretly, with his law partner as a witness to the contract, and has created the suspicion in the minds of millions of his countrymen that a President of the United States can use his high office for private gain.

The suspicion, like a "damned spot," has been burned into the brains of the people, and will no more "out" than Duncan's blood could be washed from the lily hands of the demented Lady Macbeth. And here let me remark, in passing, that this last of the Democratic Presidents (for, mark my prophecy, he is the last that party, as now organized, will ever elect) will go down in history and his two Administrations will be chiefly remarkable; the first as having to deal with a large and unwieldy surplus, which entailed the necessity, as he contended, for the purchase of undue bonds at an exorbitant premium, while his last has been signalized, after a peristent adherence to his pet schemes of finance and taxation, by a deficit, by the issue of bonds, contrary to the law, to pay the current expenses of the Government, and an infamous attempt to increase the bonded debt of the country more than $500,000,000 and the surrender to those same corporations which he so abused of the absolute control of our paper currency.

The Democratic party elected him and reelected him, and would have no other leader. It must bear the odium of his official misdeeds, his utter lack of statesmanship. He has never been a Democrat, measured by the standard of Jefferson and Jackson. His opinions and policy on finance have been those of SHERMAN, who is not a Republican, measured by the standard of Lincoln. He differs from the Republican party only in the one particular of the tariff, and on that he has blown hot and cold as his pet hobby, and will go down in history as the most gigantic failure of any man who ever occupied the White House, all because of his vanity and obstinacy.

Now, to make good this charge, I will recall the fact that when he came to power in March, 1893, and could have called the Senate and House together (Democratic for the first time since the war) to carry his policy into effect, what did he do? Did he call an extra session to give tariff reform to the people—the overburdened and downtrodden people whose wants and woes he had depicted in so many speeches and messages? Oh, no. The policy of gold monometallism, of more bonds, of the substitution of national-bank currency for greenbacks and silver certificates, the scheme which was nearest his heart, first enlisted his care and energetic action. He called Congress together to stop the coinage of silver, and here is his explanation of the trouble and the remedy proposed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The existence of an alarming and extraordinary business situation, involving the welfare and prosperity of all our people, has constrained me to call together in extra session the people's representatives in Congress, to the end that, through a wise and patriotic exercise of the legislative duty with which they solely are charged, present evils may be mitigated and dangers threatening the future may be averted.

Our unfortunate financial plight is not the result of untoward events nor of conditions related to our natural resources; nor is it traceable to any of the afflictions which frequently check national growth and prosperity. With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that the securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have invaded every branch of business.

I believe these things are principally chargeable to Congressional legislation touching the purchase and coinage of silver by the General Government.

This legislation is embodied in a statute passed on the 14th day of July, 1890, which was the culmination of much agitation on the subject involved, and which may be considered a truce, after a long struggle, between the advocates of free silver coinage and those intending to be more conservative.

Undoubtedly the monthly purchases by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, enforced under that statute, were regarded by those interested in silver production as a certain guaranty of its increase in price. The result, however, has been entirely different, for immediately following a spasmodic and slight rise the price of silver began to fall after the passage of the act and has since reached the lowest point ever known. This disappointing result has led to renewed and persistent effort in the direction of free silver coinage.

Meanwhile not only are the evil effects of the operation of the present law constantly accumulating, but the result to which its execution must inevitably lead is becoming palpable to all who give the least heed to financial subjects.

This law provides that in payment for the 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion which the Secretary of the Treasury is commanded to purchase monthly there shall be issued Treasury notes redeemable on demand in gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that said notes may be reissued. It is, however, declared in the act to be "the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law." This declaration so controls the action of the Secretary of the Treasury as to prevent his exercising the discretion nominally vested in him, if by such action the parity between gold and silver may be disturbed. Manifestly a refusal by the Secretary to pay these Treasury notes in gold, if demanded, would necessarily result in their discredit and depreciation as obligations payable only in silver, and would destroy the parity between the two metals by establishing a discrimination in favor of gold.

Up to the 15th day of July, 1893, these notes had been issued in payment of silver bullion purchases to the amount of more than $147,000,000. While all but a very small quantity of this bullion remains uncoined and without usefulness in the Treasury, many of the notes given in its purchase have been paid in gold. This is illustrated by the statement that between the 1st of May, 1892, and the 15th day of July, 1893, the notes of this kind issued in payment for silver bullion amounted to a little more than $54,000,000, and that during the same period about $49,000,000 were paid by the Treasury in gold for the redemption of such notes.

The policy necessarily adopted of paying these notes in gold has not spared the gold reserve of $100,000,000 long ago set aside by the Government for the redemption of other notes, for this fund has already been subjected to the payment of new obligations amounting to about $150,000,000.

Here was the dread alternative if the Sherman law was not repealed:

Unless Government bonds are to be constantly issued and sold to replenish our exhausted gold, only to be again exhausted, it is apparent that the operation of the silver-purchase law now in force leads in the direction of the entire substitution of silver for the gold in the Government Treasury, and that this must be followed by the payment of all Government obligations in depreciated silver.

If the alternative was that if we did not repeal the Sherman law we must issue bonds, there was an implied promise or prophecy that if we did repeal it we should not have to issue any bonds.

The cry was, "Stop the purchase of silver, stop diluting our currency, and confidence will be restored." He had waited until the "object lesson," the panic manufactured to order by his fellow-conspirators, had swept like a cyclone over the country, prostrating all business enterprise and industries, and the newspapers had howled in chorus in the ears of the people that the coinage of silver was the cause of the monetary crisis. In the meantime active agents had been at work arranging for the control and manipulation of the Democrats in the House and Senate when Congress should assemble. Congress met, and so well timed had been the date of its assemblage and so cogent the arguments brought to bear that the so-called representatives of the people were swift to obey orders. The party platform and its pledges were thrown to the dogs. Democrats pledged to the rehabilitation of silver surrendered their manhood and their principles at the behest of the money power and its representative, the President, and the purchasing clause of the Sherman law was repealed by the House with indecent haste. Democrats and Republicans vied with each other in the furtherance of the policy which had been formulated and steadily pursued by the Senator from Ohio. If he were here I would take off my hat to him, if I had it on my head, and I do it now typically, as the victor of victors in this financial struggle of a quarter of a century. He has the proud satisfaction of knowing that he has brought the party which he so hates to its knees, and has lived to see many of his old antagonists enlisted under his banner of monopoly and class privileges. They sit at his feet and acknowledge his leadership.

When the Senate met there was an acknowledged majority of men open and outspoken in their determination to stand by the white metal, and who were elected on that issue. But the process of debauchery began. "Vote according to my will or you will have no offices." "Vote according to my will, and if your people do not like it I will take care of you." The newspapers raved and abused the Senate. Bankers telegraphed and wrote. Chambers of commerce passed resolutions, and slowly the Senate yielded. In ninety days the deed was done, and the chains were riveted on the wrists of the toiling millions. Did the raid on the Treasury stop? Was confidence restored? Did prices rise? Did prosperity return? All these things had been promised by this prophet, yet none of them came to pass.

Congress convened in regular session and the farce of tariff reform began. The demoralized and dispirited House, under the whip and spur of the Executive, passed a tariff bill, and hoping to lay a pontoon bridge by which to pass back to their outraged constituents, they passed a bill providing for the coinage of the seigniorage. They wanted to bamboozle the dear farmers by saying, "While we repealed the Sherman law, we coined $50,000,000 of silver," but the President would none of it; and while he attempted to bulldoze the Senate into accepting the tariff measure without amendment, in spite of his simulated vehemence and indignation, the tariff bill was modified in many particulars. It passed finally, and we have had an experience with this measure of tariff reform a la Cleveland.

It is true he did not sign it and allowed it to become a law without approval. But here again we have a spectacle of charlatanry and a hypocritical assumption of superiority to his party which has always marked his career. The tariff law which he repudiated as unworthy, involving "party perfidy and party dishonor," is the sheet anchor to which he now clings.

It is not what the President champion would have given us (so he says); but when we recollect that his managers at Chicago, who controlled the convention and the committee on platform, presented a tariff plank which the convention indignantly refused to indorse, because it was, in the language of Henry Watterson, a "disgraceful straddle," we are forced to conclude that all the hurrah and eloquence emanating from the President on this question have been a blind, used in a Pickwickian sense, so to speak, and that there have been hypocrisy and double dealing in his treatment of this question. If he was honest at the start (and I am willing to grant that much) his associations with Wall street and his connection with wealthy men have debauched his conscience and destroyed all sympathy with the masses. He would not sign the bill, and lectured the Senate as recreant; but if his scheme, carried out only in part, has caused so large a deficit in three years and required the issue of bonds to meet current expenses, what would have been the result had he had his way? He and his Republican allies refused persistently to see that all the trouble was caused by the warfare on silver and the mismanagement of our finances, and that the remedies proposed would only aggravate the disease preying on the body politic.

The fall in prices of all farm products, which are our principal articles of export, has brought disaster and ruin on the producing classes who farm—one-half of our entire population. The impoverishment of the farmers has destroyed their ability to purchase on the one hand, while the decreased price of their products of export in European markets has left our debts for imports and interest on our obligations abroad unpaid. Hence the export of gold to meet those obligations. The boasted "home market" for which the protectionists clamor can no longer purchase the products of our home factories except in largely decreased quantities. The basis of all wealth, agriculture, being depressed and pauperized, all other interests resting upon it are depressed and injured. The Englishman chuckles, as shown by the Senator from Colorado, at the cheapness of the exports which we send him. I will take the liberty, with the Senator's permission, to insert as an appendix the figures furnished from that English paper the other day in regard to the profit of one year's purchase of cotton and wheat, as showing the cause of this deficit requiring the export of gold.

Then mark the result. With the gold being exported to meet our foreign obligations, and the public credit attacked by the gold gamblers with the encouragement and connivance of the President, Rothschild and his American agents graciously condescend to come to the help of the United States Treasury in maintaining the gold standard which has wrought the ruin and only charge a small commission of ten millions or so on one little transaction.

Great God! that this proud Government, the richest and strongest on the face of the globe, should have been brought to so low a pass that a London Jew should have been appointed its receiver, to have charge of the Treasury, with an option on any additional issue of bonds, and presumes to patronize us and promises to take care of our great country! Is there a man here who can think of it without blushing?

I ask in this connection the right to insert as an appendix this infamous contract, with Stetson as witness. I wish to insert also a rehearsal from the Democratic campaign book of 1888, setting forth the history of the purchase of bonds with that surplus which used to keep this man awake at nights. Let me read a headline: "Giving small holders a chance." He did not call for a syndicate to sell him bonds. He said, "Anybody who wants to take money in place of bonds bring them in at any premium you have a mind to charge—125 or 130, along there." They were undue, and he spent a hundred million dollars or so—I do not know the exact amount—in buying those bonds. I have it here. It must be authentic, as it comes from the Democratic campaign committee. [Laughter.] I wish to put the two cheek by jowl—in juxtaposition.

In this connection, before I leave the subject of greenbacks and bonds, I wish to read just a brief paragraph from that campaign speech, that keynote speech of the 3d of January, delivered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], when he thrashed the old straw over again:

I believe that under existing law the aggregate sum of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890, amounting to about $460,000,000, can be easily maintained at par with coin if the two amendments I have mentioned are adopted by Congress. These notes are a legal tender for all debts, public or private. They are a debt of the United States without interest and without other material cost to the Government than the interest on the cost of the coin or bullion held in the Treasury to redeem them. They are preferred by the people to any other form of paper money that has been devised. They have all the sanctions of law and all the security that has been or can be given to our bonds. They have the pledge of the public faith that they will be redeemed in coin. The substitution of these notes for State-bank paper money was one of the greatest benefits that has resulted from the civil war. These notes have all the sanction, protection, and security that has been or can be given to our national-bank notes, with the added benefit that the large saving derived from them inures to the people of the United States instead of to the bankers.

I left this out a while ago, intending to put it in the opening part of my speech, when I was discussing the relative value and desirability of greenbacks and bonds. One, a promise of the Government bearing no interest, the other also a promise, the difference being that it bears interest and is a mortgage on the people. Here we have the apostle of Republican finance, the apostle of gold, the one before whom you Republicans all bow down and worship as the keenest, shrewdest manipulator in behalf of class privileges and monometallism that ever lived, or that ever will live, I suspect—here are his words in testimony as to the substantial nature of those notes and their value. Now the trouble is that the country is already drying up, is atrophied, palsied in its extremities for want of blood, the circulating medium, money. The brain at Boston and the heart at New York are congested, and they say "We have plenty of money; we do not want any more money." And yet you stand committed to the proposition that those extremities shall dry up and die, rot, be pauperized, and you will not give any relief. Your scheme is not different from that of the President.

I have an interesting book here, and ask the Secretary to read some extracts from it, being excerpts from letters from JOHN SHERMAN during and just after the war, commencing at page 150. There are five of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as indicated.

The SECRETARY. From a letter dated Senate Chamber, Washington, May 19, 1862:

Even under terrible financial pressure and drain of active war, the country is flourishing. Our bonds are above par, trade is active, and produce bears a good price. Much of this may be induced by the inflation of paper money, but gold is abundant, foreign importations active, and foreigners are making investments here heavily. In my experience in public affairs I have never known times more easy.

From a letter dated Mansfield, Ohio, May 7, 1863:

One tendency I noticed—nearly every man in debt is paying off his debts. The inflation of the currency and the rise of property make this easy. Unluckily for me, most of my means is or was "in bills receivable." These are paid, or will be, and so I find myself with plenty of money, but can not buy anything at reasonable prices. This is the general rule of creditors, and perhaps it is better so for the community, as the creditor class can more easily bear the loss of inflation.

From a letter dated Mansfield, Ohio, November 14, 1863:

The wonderful prosperity of all classes, especially of laborers, has a tendency to secure acquiesence in all measures demanded to carry on the war. We are only another example of a people growing rich in a great war. And this is not shown simply by inflated prices but by increased production, new manufacturing establishments, new railroads, houses, etc. Indeed, every branch of business is active and hopeful. This is not a mere temporary inflation caused by paper money, but is a steady progress and almost entirely upon actual capital. The people are prospering and show their readiness to push on the war. Taxes are paid cheerfully.

From a letter dated United States Senate, January 29, 1864:

The currency is awfully inflated, and our ability to borrow and to pay interest has a limit. If the war continues two years longer we shall be terribly embarrassed. Still we have the sure foundation of public credit, a great country, and a large and active population.

From a letter dated United States Senate Chamber, Washington, November 10, 1865:

The truth is, the close of the war with our resources unimpared gives an elevation, a scope, to the ideas of leading capitalists far higher than anything ever undertaken in this country before. They talk of millions as confidently as formerly of thousands. No doubt the contraction that must soon come will explode mere visionary schemes, but many vast undertakings will be executed. Among them will be the Pacific Railroad and extensive iron works like some in England.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, again I regret the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], because if he were present I should ask him this question, and if he deems it worth while he can answer it hereafter: If, as I have said, with only 22,000,000 people at that time floating the enormous amount of currency issued to carry on the war, with 1,000,000 men or more withdrawn from productive industries to be marshaled under the Stars and Stripes for the maintenance of the Union, the country was so prosperous, with industries thriving, no tramps, no beggars, what did it? Enough money; perhaps too much money, but still enough.

If in 1878, I believe it was, when Congress in obedience to the orders of the people declared that those greenbacks should not be retired, but should be reissued, we could float that much paper money before we had any gold or any silver basis, in the name of common sense and the idea of prosperity, which seems to have departed from this legislative assembly, why can we not now put out six or eight hundred million dollars of greenbacks? Give us the double standard, and we can float that many greenbacks at par with gold and silver any day in the year, and there will be no more talk of the public credit and of the honor of the nation. The struggle, and the only struggle, is whether we shall have all Government paper or all national-bank paper; and if under the behests of the gold ring we are to go to a monometallic standard and to national-bank notes alone, I ask some man to answer why the Government's primary notes are not as good as its secondary notes? The reason is you have your 4,000 millionaires; you want a few thousand more, with about 60,000,000 paupers.

And what are the people going to do about it? Why are these iniquities permitted, and the outrageous and unlawful actions of the Executive unchecked? No man here denies the assertion that it is unlawful to issue bonds to pay the current expenses of the Government, and yet it has been done. There has been a lame explanation attempted, that redeemed greenbacks had to go into the general fund and be reissued, but if they were received for the gold for which the bonds have been issued and they were not used to pay current expenses, where are they? The responsibility of providing revenues and looking after the solvency of the Treasury, which rests with Congress, has been usurped by the President.

Now comes the crucial question for the Republican party. Why have you not impeached him? You have nearly a three-fourths majority at the other end of the Capitol, which alone can formulate articles of impeachment. Why have you not impeached him?

Mr. HAWLEY. How was it with the last Congress? The last Congress was Democratic.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already paid my respects to the last Congress, and I hoped to have been able to say better things of the one the people have just sent here, but they are both of a kind, a majority of them cowards and tools of monopolies. Why is he not impeached? Because he is carrying out Republican policies, and the majority in the House of Representatives feel safe, the Senators over here feel safe, and you all believe that the Republican party is certain to elect the next President and obtain control of the Government.

You are willing to load down the "incompetent or dishonest Democracy"—I use the words of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and I put it incompetent and dishonest Democracy—you are willing to load them down with the odium of the misgovernment, to lend your help by acquiescence in wrongdoing. The policy is to do nothing—"to preserve a masterly inactivity"—and only obstruct where relief could be given. But there is many a slip betwixt the cup and the lip, and in this dark and dismal hour the words of Lincoln, the great and noble martyr—Lincoln, whose Republicanism was Democracy of the purest type compared with that of Cleveland—come like a promise from the grave. This greatest American of the nineteenth century said: "You can fool all of the people part of the time, and you can fool part of the people all of the time; but you can never fool all of the people all of the time." Unless that grand inspired pledge to which he consecrated his auditors at Gettysburg is to be forgotten and come to naught, "that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth," the people must shake off their lethargy and arouse themselves.

The money changers are in the temple of our liberties and have bought the sentinels on guard. It may be too late. God grant it be not so; but this great Republic can only be saved from the miseries of revolution and internecine strife in the near future by its citizens casting aside blind allegiance to party and marshaling themselves under the banner of Jefferson's Democracy and Lincoln's Republicanism, determined to restore the Republic to the form in which it was left to us by the fathers, and since consecrated by the blood of brothers, shed in civil war, engendered and brought about by just such statesmanship as we have here. The encroachments of the Federal judiciary, and the supineness and venality—corruption, I may say—of the representative branches of the Government are causes of deep concern to all thinking and patriotic men. We are fast drifting into government by injunction in the interest of monopolies and corporations, and the Supreme Court, by one corrupt vote, annuls an act of Congress looking to the taxation of the rich.

Sir, the struggle from 1861 to 1865, which drenched this fair land in blood, was to emancipate 4,000,000 black slaves. We are fast approaching a condition which will place the collar of industrial bondage around the necks of ten times that many white slaves. I would not predict revolution or war if I did not feel that relief must come either by the ballot or that an effort will be made in a few years to obtain it by bullets. You may look upon me as an enthusiast, as an alarmist, or an anarchist, but with the sober convictions of common sense I tell you that the teaching of all history is belied and we must surrender the belief that like causes produce like effects if men expect that the millions now out of employment and the other millions who are working out a hopeless existence of toil year in and year out, the women "stitching in poverty, hunger, and dirt," depicted this morning by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], the men bearing their hopeless burdens of debt, all directly traceable to bad government, will not some day have a reckoning.

You all remember Macaulay's prediction that some day a government would be put in charge of this country by the commune. When that time comes, God have mercy on you millionaires who have stolen so much of the people's money.

I listened the other day to the impassioned eloquence of the Senator from Maine as he appealed for sympathy for the unfortunate Christians who are being butchered by the Turks in Armenia. As he portrayed the ruthless murders and infamies perpetrated on those defenseless people, and called on us to extend the strong arm of the United States to give help, I could but think that he stands here as an ardent supporter of that English policy of finance which has brought untold misery and means absolute pauperism for the masses of our people. And I recalled an incident which I read long since in the Life of John Randolph of Roanoke. It was during the Greek revolution, when the sympathy of all civilized peoples went out to the struggling descendants of the glorious old Greeks who were trying to throw off the Turkish yoke. In many parts of this country efforts were made to raise money to send to the Greeks to help them in their fight for freedom. A lady who lived near Randolph was deeply interested, and had a subscription list which she presented to Mr. Randolph one day as he was mounting his horse after a friendly call. She depicted with glowing eloquence the claims of the struggling Greeks for aid. As on all large Southern plantations at that time, there were a number of negro children around the house. I have seen them in my boyhood; I have got up on the fence with them. They gathered in a row in their scant clothing—one little cotton garment in the summer—on the roadside near by to look at the strange man. After hearing what their mistress had to say, the eccentric Virginian, with a wave of his hand in the direction of the little negroes, remarked, "Madam, the Greeks are at your door," and with a deep bow he rode off.

I say to the Senator from Maine and to the other Senators who stand here as exponents of the creed which would enslave the American people by the consummation of the scheme to which they are committed: The Armenians are here at your doors. In every city and hamlet and county of these United States they can be found, and I warn you they will not be held down for all time by the Turks who now oppress them. A day of reckoning will come, unless there is no longer a just God in heaven, and when it does come, woe be unto those who have been among the oppressors of the people. The present struggle is unfortunately too like that which preceded the late civil war, inasmuch as it is sectional. The creditor and the manufacturing States of the North and East, those which have grown inordinately wealthy at the expense of the producing classes of the South and West, are urging this policy with the besotted blindness of Belshazzar. The old slaveholders of the South were not more arrogant or more determined. "The sordid despotism of wealth," to use the apt phrase of Justice Brown, is already felt throughout the land.

The Representatives in Congress from those States, without regard to party affiliations, are solidly arrayed under the banner of monopoly and the gold standard. Greed and self-interest seem alone to actuate them. Self-preservation and patriotism should bind the South and West in equally strong bonds of union. We can not afford to longer put party above country.

You have already been told in glowing language by the eloquent Senator from Missouri that the conflict is "irrepressible," and it is easy to see from the temper and feeling of the equally distinguished Senator from Colorado and other Western Senators that the struggle for the new emancipation has begun. And the new Mason and Dixon's line which is drawn, not by the surveyor, but by the denial of the natural and inalienable "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" to a large majority of citizens, will sooner or later bring together in the bonds of union the toiling and now downtrodden masses of the cities and the equally desperate masses of the country; agrarianism and communism will join hands. There are millions now on the march, and they tramp, tramp, tramp; tramp the sidewalks hunting work and tramp the highways begging bread. Unless relief comes they will some day take a notion to tramp to Washington with rifles in their hands to regain the liberties which have been stolen from them or which their representatives have sold; and the hitherto conservative force of the Republic, the well-to-do agricultural class, will lift no hand to stay the march, but join it. God grant that our country may be spared the enactment of such scenes as were witnessed in Paris in 1789. But the fair flower of liberty planted by Jefferson in the immortal Declaration of the 4th of July, 1776, watered by the blood of our Revolutionary sires under Washington, can not be uprooted or smothered by the noxious weeds of monopoly and class privilege without bloodshed; and a cataclysm which will give us a military despotism or leave the Republic redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled is just as sure to come as yonder sun shines in the heavens, unless we do our duty here and take the hands of these conspirators off the people's throats and give them an opportunity to breathe, to work, to live.

APPENDIX A.

CONTRACT.

This agreement entered into this 8th day of February, 1895, between the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, of the first part, and Messrs. August Belmont & Co., of New York, on behalf of Messrs. N. M. Rothschild & Sons, of London, England, and themselves, and Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., of New York, on behalf of Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co., of London, and themselves, parties of the second part.

Witnesseth: Whereas it is provided by the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 3700) that the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin with any of the bonds or notes of the United States authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interests; and the Secretary of the Treasury now deems that an emergency exists in which the public interests require that, as hereinafter provided, coin shall be purchased with the bonds of the United States, of the description hereinafter mentioned, authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, being bonds of the United States described in an act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt."

Now, therefore, the said parties of the second part hereby agree to sell and deliver to the United States 3,500,000 ounces of standard gold coin of the United States, at the rate of $17.80441 per ounce, payable in United States 4 per cent thirty-year coupon or registered bonds, said bonds to be dated February 1, 1895, and payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from date, issued under the acts of Congress of July 14, 1870, January 20, 1871, and January 14, 1875, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable quarterly.

First. Such purchase and sale of gold coin being made on following conditions:

(1) At least one-half of all coin deliverable hereinunder shall be obtained in and shipped from Europe, but the shipments shall not be required to exceed 300,000 ounces per month, unless the parties of the second part shall consent thereto.

(2) All deliveries shall be made at any of the subtreasuries or at any other legal depository of the United States.

(3) All gold coins delivered shall be received on the basis of 25.8 grains of standard gold per dollar, if within limits of tolerance.

(4) Bonds delivered under this contract are to be delivered free of accrued interest, which is to be assumed and paid by the parties of the second part at the time of their delivery to them.

Second. Should the Secretary of the Treasury desire to offer or sell any bonds of the United States on or before the 1st day of October, 1895, he shall first offer the same to the parties of the second part; but thereafter he shall be free from every such obligation to the parties of the second part.

Third. The Secretary of the Treasury hereby reserves the right, within ten days from the date hereof, in case he shall receive authority from Congress therefor, to substitute any bonds of the United States bearing 3 per cent interest, of which the principal and interest shall be specifically payable in United States gold coin of the present weight and fineness, for the bonds herein alluded to, such 3 per cent bonds to be accepted by the parties of the second part at par, i. e., at $18.60465 per ounce of standard gold.

Fourth. No bonds shall be delivered to the parties of the second part, or either of them, except in payment for coin from time to time received hereunder; whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall and will deliver the bonds as herein provided, at such places as shall be designated by the parties of the second part. Any expense of delivery out of the United States shall be assumed and paid by the parties of the second part.

Fifth. In consideration of the purchase of such coin, the parties of the second part, and their associates hereunder, assume and will bear all the expense and inevitable loss of bringing gold from Europe hereunder; and, as far as lies in their power, will exert all financial influence and will make all legitimate efforts to protect the Treasury of the United States against the withdrawals of gold pending the complete performance of this contract.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands in five parts this 8th day of February, 1895.

APPENDIX B.

[From the Democratic campaign book, 1888.]

BUYING BONDS FOR THE SINKING FUND—EFFORTS TO REDUCE THE SURPLUS BY RELEASING PUBLIC MONEY TO THE COUNTRY FOR THE PURPOSES OF BUSINESS.

In the matter of the management of the national finances, a brief review of some of the difficulties which had to be encountered and of the dangers which threatened the country, and of the manner in which they have been avoided and averted, will satisfy every candid and impartial mind that this branch of the public service was never more ably or more faithfully administered.

On the 30th of June, 1887, the surplus in the Treasury, according to the Treasurer's statement of assets and liabilities, was $45,698,594.15. The expenditures, actual and estimated, including the sinking fund, for the fiscal year 1888 were $316,817,785.48, and the revenues of the Government for the same period under existing tariff and revenue laws were estimated to be approximately $383,000,000. Thus an addition to the surplus during the fiscal year of $66,182,214.52 was expected, making the total surplus on the 30th of June, 1888, $111,880,808.67. This was the situation as it appeared one year ago. It will be seen from what follows that the estimate was far below the reality.

Early in August, 1887, it became apparent that the rapid accumulation of money in the Treasury, which had already created a feeling of great anxiety and uneasiness in business centers, would soon cause severe stringency in the money markets. The time was approaching when the annual shipments of money to the West for the purpose of moving the crops would deplete the reserves in the great cities. This depletion, which in good years is always great enough to increase the loaning rate to 7 per cent and upward, threatened to be so great as to cripple the movement of money so necessary to the welfare of the country, particularly of the great grain-raising sections of the West, and the constantly increasing surplus in the Treasury was daily adding to the gravity of the situation.

At this juncture the Secretary of the Treasury wisely determined that instead of distributing the purchases for the sinking fund over the whole fiscal year, as he would do in ordinary circumstances, he would invest the entire amount, nearly $28,000,000, at once or as rapidly as possible, hoping thereby to so far relieve the impending distress as to tide over the period of moving the crops, and so prevent business disturbances during that critical time. To this end he published the circular of August, 1887, and later the circular of September, 1887, for the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund. The first circular proposed to receive offers weekly at prices to be named by the owners, and when all which were offered at fair prices had been obtained by that method the second circular was published fixing a price at which they would be received.

Under these two circulars the Secretary purchased $24,844,650 of bonds at a cost of $27,842,237.10. No comment is needed to emphasize the importance and vast benefit of this operation. The Secretary placed in the hands of the people nearly $28,000,000 of money with which to carry on the most important business transactions of the year. The wisdom and success of this measure is best shown by the fact that throughout the period when the greatest trouble has heretofore occurred not the slightest disturbance of business was recorded, and the average rate paid for money on call in New York, the great banking center of the country, was never lowered.

Upon completing the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund the question of disposing of the further additions to the surplus was carefully considered. The authority to purchase bonds in addition to the sinking-fund requirements was not considered to be so clear and unequivocal as to justify the Secretary in making purchases.

DISTRIBUTING GOVERNMENT MONEY THROUGH THE BANKS.

The authority to do this, such as it was, was contained in a paragraph in the legislative appropriation bill approved March 3, 1881, and after a careful survey of all the circumstances it was decided that doubt existed, and that all other lawful means should first be exhausted before resorting to other purchases. The only resource left appeared to be in the Secretary's authority to use national banks as depositories of public money. Prior to this time the deposits in national banks had been somewhat restricted by the unprofitable nature of the sums offered to the banks. They were limited to a deposit of 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds deposited by them as security, so that from 18 to 36 per cent of the value of the bonds was practically locked up. In view of the high premium which these bonds commanded as an investment, it was decided to allow a deposit of the par value of 4½ per cent bonds held at maturity and a deposit of 110 per cent against 4 per cent bonds held. The result is best shown by the following statement:

On the 1st of July, 1885, there were 141 national banks whose designations as depositories were in force, and the deposits of public moneys in their hands amounted to $12,928,264.47. On the 1st of July, 1888, there were 294 banks holding public deposits of $59,979,039.63. This is an increase of 153 banks, and an increase of deposits in their hands of $47,050,775.16. In other words, there are more than twice as many banks now acting as depositories as there were three years ago, and they hold nearly five times as much public money as they did three years ago. The great sum of $47,000,000 is now in the hands of the people as the result of the wise and liberal policy of the Secretary, instead of remaining locked up in the Treasury, as it would have remained under the policy formerly in operation; and the security held for the safe return to the Treasury of the money deposited was ample, for the 4½ per cent bonds held by the Treasury have at all times been worth at least 7 per cent more than the deposits and the 4 per cent bonds at least 15 per cent more. Either class of bonds can be sold at a day's notice, so that no possible contingency could result in loss to the Government.

BUYING BONDS UPON OFFERS FROM THE PUBLIC.

The efforts of the Secretary to keep down the surplus in the Treasury were effectual during the fall and early winter, but the time soon came when something more must be done, for the surplus continued to grow and the measures which had been so effective early in the fiscal year were now inoperative, which were clearly foreseen, and to which the present Secretary and his able predecessor, Mr. Manning, had repeatedly called the attention of Congress without avail. The absorption of public moneys by the depository banks had reached its limit, and the sinking-fund requirements had been supplied, so that nothing remained to be done but to await the action of Congress. There had been discussion of the subject in both Houses, but no material progress toward the settlement of the question had been made. In April, however, the House passed a resolution declaratory of its judgment that the clause in the appropriation bill of March 3, 1881, was still in force, and a similar resolution was passed a few days later in the Senate.

The sanction of Congress having thus been practically given to the policy of purchasing unmatured obligations at a premium, the Secretary promptly, on the day after the passage of the Senate resolution, published a circular, dated April 17, 1888, inviting daily offerings of bonds to the Government. This circular, like those which preceded it in August and September, 1887, invited the people to deal directly with the Government in selling their bonds, being a marked departure from the policy of former Administrations in this respect. All previous purchases had been made through the subtreasury in New York, and a deposit as a guarantee of good faith was required. This restriction placed the business of selling bonds to the Government exclusively in the hands of the professional dealers in securities, and consequently placed individual holders at their mercy. Under the present system the humblest citizen of the United States, owner of a bond for $50, can deal directly with the Government, and his proposal for the sale of his bond receives from the Secretary the same consideration and, if his bond is accepted, the same prompt payment as that accorded the dealer who sells his millions at a time.

THE EFFECTS OF BOND PURCHASES.

Under this circular of April 17, 1888, the Secretary had purchased up to June 30, 1888, $18,383,800 4 per cent bonds, at a cost of $23,347,744.20, and $8,393,050 4½ per cents, at a cost of $9,039,056.20, making a total disbursement on account of purchase $32,386,800.40.

The bonds so purchased, it should be remembered, were not redeemable, the 4½ per cents being payable after September, 1891, and the 4 per cents not until after July 1, 1907. The amount, therefore, which the Government would pay in interest and principal on the bonds if outstanding till maturity would be for the 4½ per cents $9,705,158.31 and for the 4 per cents $32,539,326, making a total of $42,244,484.31.

The difference between this amount and the amount actually paid results in a direct saving to the Government of $9,857,683.91, which, added to savings in 1887 of $4,832,668.62, makes a total saving of $14,790,352.53, so that at the same time that the Secretary of the Treasury was relieving the people by disbursing the money they so badly needed he was saving to them nearly $15,000,000, and making possible a still further reduction of taxation to that amount.

Notwithstanding the utmost endeavors of the Secretary to diminish the surplus, statements published at the close of the fiscal year 1888 show that it is larger than at the commencement of the purchases in August, 1887. According to the statements of assets and liabilities for August 1, 1887, the surplus was then $45,698,594.15, and on July 1, 1888, it was $103,220,464.71, which is an increase of $57,521,870.56, notwithstanding the purchase during the interval of United States bonds costing over $32,000,000, in addition to those purchased in August for the sinking fund, and which were included in the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year.

It has already been shown that the estimates made on June 20, 1887, for the ensuing fiscal year indicated a probable surplus of $111,880,808.67 during the year. The actual surplus was $135,607,265.11, consisting of $103,220,464.71 still in the Treasury and $32,386,800.40 paid for bonds purchased. This is an increase over the estimate of $23,726,456.44.

GIVING SMALL HOLDERS A CHANCE.

When the circular of April 17, 1888, was published, inviting proposals for the sale of bonds to the Government, public notice was given to the country through the press that the names of the persons offering bonds to the Government would not be published. This action was taken in consequence of the unwillingness of the owners of bonds to have their private affairs made public. It was thought that this course would encourage the owners to deal directly with the Department, thereby saving the commissions and profits which dealers would acquire if the bonds should get into their hands, and at the same time increase the amounts offered and sold to the Government. The wisdom of this course was apparent from the outset. Notwithstanding the scarcity of bonds for sale, and the fact that the Government declined to encourage any strong advance in the price, the Secretary succeeded, up to June 13, 1888, in purchasing $15,471,350 of 4 percents and $7,647,750 4½ percents, at a total cost of $27,859,888.15.

At this point, however, a serious obstacle to further successful operation presented itself in the shape of a resolution from the United States Senate, calling on the Secretary for a full statement of his purchases, including names of owners, amounts, and prices. This resolution was introduced by a Republican Senator, who affected to believe that questionable transactions had taken place in connection with these purchases. It was made clear to the Senate during debate that the passage of the resolution would restrict and perhaps entirely prevent further purchases, but by a party vote the resolution was carried, and in obedience thereto the Secretary furnished the information called for, which was promptly printed by order of the Senate and so made public.

An examination of the published statement showed that there was not the slightest basis for the insinuations so freely thrown out during the Senate debate on the resolution, but the attack on the policy of the Administration, which was probably the real motive for the resolution, proved, as had been feared, very effective. Prior to the passage of the resolution the purchases had amounted to $26,119,100, an average of $502,300 daily. Since that time they have been $3,886,900, an average of only $125,350 daily.

A distinctive feature of the purchases of bonds during the fiscal year is the relatively large number of small holders who have offered their bonds to the Government. Heretofore when purchases were made through the Assistant Treasurer at New York the bonds were offered by regular dealers in large amounts, but the offerings up to July 17 under the circular of April 17, 1888, numbered 733, involving a total amount of $107,367,100, and 428 of these offers were in sums of less than $50,000, separated as follows: 61 of less than $1,000, 113 of less than $5,000, 70 of less than $10,000, and 184 of less than $50,000. These figures show the widespread popularity of the Secretary's plan of purchasing bonds.

APPENDIX C.

[From the Statist, London, January 11, 1896.]

OUR FOREIGN TRADE—THE EFFECT OF LOW PRICES.

Our foreign trade in 1895 has been the most profitable in the history of the country, and very much more profitable than it was in 1890, when superficially it appeared to be extremely prosperous. Reckoned by its cash value, our foreign trade has been slightly better in 1895 than in 1894, and much worse than in 1890. In 1890 our imports amounted to £420,692,000. In 1894 they were £408,345,000, and in 1895 they have been £416,618,000. That is to say, our imports have been £8,342,000 greater in 1895 than in 1894, and £4,000,000 smaller than in 1890. As regards the cash value of our exports, an increase of £10,000,000 has occurred in 1895 compared with 1894, and a decline of as much as £37,400,000 compared with 1890, exports in 1890 having been valued at £263,530,000, in 1894 at £216,194,000, and in 1895 at £226,169,000.

The course of our foreign trade as reflected in the cash value of our imports and exports will be seen from the following contrast of our imports, exports, reexports, and total foreign trade in 1895 with those of the ten previous years:

Total trade of Great Britain, 1885 to 1895.

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Reexports.	Total.
1895	£416,688,000	£226,169,000	£59,971,000	£702,828,000
1894	408,344,000	215,824,000	57,961,000	682,129,000
1893	405,068,000	218,496,000	58,935,000	682,499,000
1892	423,793,000	227,077,000	64,563,000	715,433,000
1891	435,441,000	247,235,000	61,878,000	744,555,000
1890	420,692,000	263,530,000	64,721,000	748,944,000
1889	427,637,000	248,935,000	66,658,000	743,230,000
1888	387,636,000	234,535,000	64,042,000	686,213,000
1887	362,227,000	221,914,000	59,349,000	643,490,000

The conditions of 1895, compared with both 1894 and 1890, have been that prices of foreign and colonial produce have been extremely low, and that, consequently, a great deal more produce has had to be sent to this country in order to meet interest and other obligations. Further, prices of British manufactures exported have not fallen to an extent corresponding to the decline in prices of foreign and colonial produce imported, and consequently the cash proceeds of our exports have purchased a relatively larger quantity of British and foreign produce.

A year ago we drew attention to the effect on our trade of the enormous fall in prices, and showed that whereas in 1894 our imports were valued at £408,500,000, we had for this sum been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce which, had we had to pay the prices of 1890, would have cost us £477,500,000. On the other hand, we showed that in 1894 our exports were valued at £216,194,000, whereas at the prices current in 1890 they would have fetched £246,000,000. On balance, therefore, there was a greater profit upon our foreign trade in 1894 than in 1890 of about £39,000,000.

In 1895 this country has been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce even more cheaply than in 1894.

We have calculated what all the chief articles would have cost had we had to pay and had received similar prices in 1895 to those current in 1894. It is impossible to estimate the prices of a great many articles in either year, but, having analyzed the prices of commodities comprising 60 per cent of our total imports and exports, we have estimated the movement of prices of the remaining 40 per cent on the same basis.

In 1894 the cash value of our imports was £408,345,000, and in 1895 £416,687,000. Had we paid the same prices in 1895 as in 1894, our imports in 1895 would have cost us about £433,800,000. Hence we have benefited from a further fall in prices of foreign produce to the extent of about £17,000,000. On the other hand, the cash value of our exports in 1894 was £215,824,000, and in 1895 it amounted to £226,169,000. Had we been able to obtain the same price in 1895 as in 1894, the cash value would have been £234,800,000. The fall in prices of our manufactures exported in 1895 compared with 1894 thus entailed a loss of $8,600,000, as against the profit of £17,000,000 from the fall in prices of commodities imported. There has thus been a further profit in 1895 compared with 1894 of some £8,500,000.

The cash value of our imports in 1895 was £416,687,000, but at the 1890 level of prices the value would have been no less than £507,100,000. The benefit to this country, therefore, from the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce in 1895 compared with 1890 thus amounted to the enormous sum of £90,400,000. On the other hand, our exports in 1895 were of the cash value of only £226,169,000, whereas at the prices of 1890 the value would have been £267,600,000, thus entailing a loss of £41,500,000, due to the fall in prices. On balance, therefore, the fall in prices in 1895 compared with 1890 gave a profit to this country amounting to about £49,000,000.

We compare below the actual cash value of our imports in 1895 with what the value would have been at the prices current in 1894 and 1890:

Value of imports, 1895.

At prices of 1895	£416,687,000
At prices of 1894	433,851,000
At prices of 1890	507,096,000

Below we give the value of our exports in 1895 compared with what the value would have been at prices current in 1894 and 1890:

Value of exports, 1895.

At prices of 1895	£226,169,000
At prices of 1894	234,802,000
At prices of 1890	267,638,000

we purchased 100,118,000 hundredweight of wheat and flour, as against 76,247,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 23,871,000, or 31 per cent, while we have actually paid about £2,451,000 less in 1895 than in 1890, the value of our wheat and flour imports in 1895 having been £30,207,000, against £32,651,000 in 1890. In other words, at the 1890 level of prices we should have paid £42,880,000 for our wheat and flour supplies in 1895, whereas we have actually paid only £30,207,000, a benefit from the lower price of no less than £12,600,000. Our imports of wool for 1895 exceeded those of 1890 by 142,000,000 pounds, or 22 per cent; but in 1895 we actually paid £830,000 less than we did in 1890—that is to say, we have paid £26,321,000 for wool in 1895 which at the 1890 level of prices would have cost us £33,100,000, a benefit of about £6,800,000. In 1895 we imported 31,157,000 hundredweight of sugar, as against 25,693,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 5,464,000, or 21 per cent, and with this enormous increase in quantity we have actually paid £390,000 less in cash, the cash value of our sugar imports in 1895 having been £17,685,000, as agalnst £18,075,000 ie 1890. At the 1890 level of prices we should have paid for sugar imported in 1895, £21,870,000, as against the actual cost of £17,685,000, a benefit from thn fall in price of over £4,000,000.

Below we contrast the values of our principal imports in 1895 with those of 1894, and with their estimated value in 1895, had prices maintained the level of the average in 1894:

Mr. BAKER. The Senate having under consideration the so-called silver bill, I offer an amendment to section 1, and ask to have it read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by adding at the end of section 1 the following provisos:

Provided, That the use of gold and silver as standard money shall be continued on an equality and parity, and in order to obtain such equal and exact result the same legal-tender quality is hereby given to silver as is now possessed by gold under existing laws of the United States, and that the mints of the United States shall be open alike to the coinage of both metals on an equality and parity; that is, the ratio shall be 23$\frac{22}{100}$ grains of fine gold to 371$\frac{1}{4}$ grains of fine silver, and that from this time forward the coinage of gold and silver shall be equal at the above ratio, and any person, firm, corporation, or agency desiring to coin gold into money shall at the same time, and as part of the same transaction, produce an equal amount of silver for coinage purposes and coin the same at the above ratio, and any person, firm, corporation, or agency desiring to coin silver into money shall at the same time, and as part of the same transaction, produce an equal amount of gold for coinage purposes and coin the same at the above ratio. And the mints shall be kept open for such purposes; and upon the production of gold and silver at the mints for such coinage purposes as here specified the same shall be forthwith coined without unnecessary delay, and without cost or expense to the person, firm, corporation, or agency so producing the same for such purposes.

Provided further, That such person, firm, corporation, or agency so producing the gold and silver at the ratio herein specified for coinage purposes may, instead of having the same coined into actual money, deposit the same with and in the Treasury of the United States, and thereupon there shall be delivered in lieu thereof bimetallic certificates similar in form and substance to the present silver certificates, which certificates shall be in denominations or bills of one, two, five, ten, or twenty dollars. One-half such deposit shall be payable in grains of gold and the other one-half thereof in grains of silver until the same shall be coined:

And provided further, That the gold and silver, when so coined as aforesaid into money, may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and in lieu thereof bimetallic certificates may be issued as hereinbefore specified, one-half thereof payable in gold and the other one-half thereof in silver.

The intent and object of this amendment being to put behind each silver dollar coined a gold dollar and behind each gold dollar coined a silver dollar, both on an equality and parity in coinage purposes, legal-tender qualities, and in purchasing and debt-paying power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be printed.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I had given notice that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina I would address the Senate, but if it be desirable to have an executive session I am content to take the floor and proceed to-morrow morning.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course if the Senator from Florida desires to proceed this evening I withdraw the motion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I stated to the Senate yesterday, I am exceedingly anxious to have some time agreed upon when a vote can be had on the regular order. There seems to be a general desire on both sides of the Chamber that the bill shall be disposed of at the earliest possible moment, and I should be glad to have some agreement as to the time when a vote shall be had on the bill and amendments. I shall be glad to have the views of Senators or any suggestions. So far as I am concerned, I hope that some hour to-morrow can be agreed on as the time for the vote. The matter has been postponed from time to time and no agreement made until now, when I presume there might be some understanding.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator that, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, he request that the time may be fixed when we shall proceed to consider the bill and amendments under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I had intended to make that request in accordance with the Senator's suggestion on yesterday. For the purpose of ascertaining the feeling of the Senate on this question, I ask for an agreement that at 2 o'clock to-morrow the Senate shall continue the consideration of the regular order and amendments thereto under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he had better make that request to-morrow morning, when the Senate is full. There are very few members here now, and those who are not here might not feel themselves bound by such an agreement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think there are quite as many Senators here as there will be to-morrow morning. However, if the Senator from Vermont objects, of course I can do nothing more than——

Mr. MORRILL. I merely made a suggestion to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the request of the Senator from Arkansas to the Senate. It is that to-morrow at 2 o'clock the unfinished business be proceeded with under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that there are four or five Senators yet to be heard on this question. I do not wish to make any objection myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. I can not consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Would the Senator from New York be willing to suggest any time at which he thinks it would be agreeable to the Senate or which would satisfy him to have a vote?

Mr. HILL. Just as soon as the Senators who desire to speak have made their speeches, then I have no objection to a vote upon the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think we could get along more rapidly if some time were fixed for the close of the debate, and I should be glad to have that done if it is agreeable to Senators. Of course I do not want to press it in any unreasonable way, but if we could agree to a vote on Friday I am sure that the time intervening would be quite enough to allow Senators to make the speeches that they desire to make.

Mr. HILL. The speeches are very interesting and they are somewhat lengthy. There are gentlemen giving notice of speeches, and some are speaking who have not given notice. Some have spoken to me who are now absent and who desire to speak, and do not wish their time to be cut off. Without going into further details, and unnecessary here, I simply say I can not consent at present to the arrangement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator is not willing, then, to consent to fix any day?

Mr. HILL. Any day in the future.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. He is not willing to indicate any day now?

Mr. HILL. I should propose the 6th day of February, if the Senator wants me to fix a date. Beyond that I can not at present state.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of course I can not consent to that. This delay has been brought about certainly without any agency of mine. I have endeavored to meet the wishes of Senators as to the time for making speeches. I shall ask the Senate to-morrow to remain in session until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CALL. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I had intended to submit some remarks on the pending bill, but I have delayed, in the hope that a vote might be reached without any further extended debate. I would waive my right, as well as my desire, to speak on the bill if an agreement could be reached to vote to-morrow at 2 o'clock, or at least to proceed to the consideration of the bill at that time under the five-minute rule. If such an agreement can not be had, and others persist in extending the debate with speeches, then I give notice that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Florida I shall desire to take the floor for the purpose of submitting some remarks to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that I chance to know what the Senator from Arkansas is himself unwilling to state, that it is a matter of great importance, if not of absolute necessity to that Senator to be absent himself from this city in the next two or three days. Being in charge of the bill it is very embarrassing to him to go away while it is pending. In view of the fact that it is necessary for him to leave very soon I hope that Senators will forego their desire to discuss at great length and with the consumption of much time the pending bill, when there are resolutions on the table just as pertinent to which speeches may be made. In the interest of the Senator from Arkansas I should be delighted if some agreement to take a vote upon this particular measure at an early day may be made in order that he may be relieved from the embarrassment that now hangs over him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Unless the Senator from Florida insists upon going on this afternoon, I propose to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator will not make that motion, and that that will not be done. With these delays and with the statement made here to-day that the bill must continue under consideration until a number of speeches are made, I must ask that the Senate shall remain longer in session in the consideration of the bill than two hours a day. We have spent only two hours and fifteen minutes to-day in the consideration of the bill, and if we propose to dispatch public business at all we must stay here until a later hour. I hope the Senate is now determined to remain in session this afternoon until a much later hour than the present before an adjournment.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Arkansas insists upon our going on this afternoon, I am willing to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the question of the free coinage of silver upon equal terms with gold is a question which ought not to be regarded as a party measure nor treated as a subject of political division. Parties are divided upon the question, and public opinion throughout the country is more or less divided. I have voted upon every occasion in the seventeen years of my service here for the free coinage on equal terms of both gold and silver. I have not done so, however, for the reasons that are given by writers or by advocates upon this subject.

I do not believe that if gold and silver were to disappear from the face of the earth civilization and commerce and the arts would disappear. I do not believe that it is impossible for the ingenuity of man to devise some other method of exchange and of representing value. But I think that the importance, and paramount importance, of this question arises from its connection with other public policies, with the condition of the country and with the natural qualities of these two mediums of exchange.

In order that we may consider in the light of abstract reason this proposition, and not in the light of fancy or of exaggerated and enthusiastic opinion, we ought to consider that the primacy of the two metals which have been termed precious metals in the commerce of all ages is due not to their natural qualities but to the exercise of power.

How is that? How is it that gold and silver have possessed a power of exchange in the use of the world that nothing else possessed? How is it that when a man sells a house for $10,000 and has in his hands the gold or the silver, or both, that that represents the value of that house? Why is that so? These are the considerations which are to be determined in deciding whether or not there shall be free coinage of these metals.

Mr. President, the arguments from analogy, the arguments from the happening of events coeval with one another have no direct point and bearing upon this question. Why is it that the $10,000 in gold or silver received in exchange for a house possesses to the person receiving it the value of that house? It can not be used for any of the purposes of life. He can not use it for subsistence, nor for clothing, nor for the uses which the other metals possess. Neither can any other person use it for any of these useful and necessary objects.

Let us consider attentively that proposition and ascertain why it is that the power to transfer and represent the value of that house is vested in this gold or this silver. The answer is obvious. It is because every man has a use for it, and will exchange for it anything he has, and need for it, and this need is compulsory and can not be avoided, and why is that so? It is because power somewhere has provided the compulsory use of this gold and this silver. The power of government has said that you shall pay the exactions of government upon you, you shall pay your debts, and you shall pay in gold or in silver, or in one to the exclusion of the other. Hence it is apparent that this universal use and demand, coextensive with the power of government, which has the power of confiscation of life, of property, and of all a country's earnings, is created by the power of government making it compulsory for the payment of debts and for the payment of taxes and government exactions. The universal necessity for its use, created by power in all the ages of the world, is that alone which has given to any money the power of representing and transferring values, not of being a standard, not of being a measure of value, for these ideas are foreign to the argument, they have no true relation to it. Money is not a standard; it is not a measure of value; it is a representative of value, and transfers value from one person to another, and it is a representative of value because the power of government has created a compulsory use for it.

This will appear from the consideration of the question. What is the office the $10,000 performs in the transaction? It transfers the value of the house from one person to another. How is the value ascertained, and why should the man say that $10,000 will represent its value to him? It is because other and similar houses can be exchanged for $10,000; that is, the house is measured by the value of other houses, but it still remains to be seen why it is that $10,000 should represent the value of other houses. That is because the $10,000 being of universal and necessary use and demand, persons who possess the $10,000 find those who have land or personal property, or services, and who have the same compulsory needs, are competing with those who own houses for his $10,000. Thus it is that the competition for its use and the relative value of houses, lands, and services fixes the value of the house, and the $10,000 represents expresses, and transfers it.

The owner of the $10,000 says, "I have no need for this money. I have paid all taxes and government exactions, but some one needs it." A person owning personal property says, "I require $10,000 to pay my taxes and my debts; I will exchange my personal property for it." What quantity of personal property? Just that quantity which others will give. What quantity is that? It is the quantity which another man offering services or some other kind of property will take for his services or other property in exchange for the house. For the $10,000 is of no use to the man who has exchanged his home for it, except it be to exchange it for some other house, or property, or services, or to hire it to some other person for their purposes; and the exchangeable value of other houses, property, or services is determined by their relations to each other, and only through this value has it any relation to that thing which, by law, is required for this exchange.

In brief, it is the competition between the uses and needs for money that determines its value in exchange for property and the value of property in exchange for it.

In the days of the Roman Empire, when failure to pay a debt was punished by the slavery of the debtor, when the creditor could take possession of the debtor as a slave, and had the power of life and death over him and his family, the compulsory use of whatever the government prescribed as the means of discharging debt was intensified over the necessity in our day. Still, now as then, the use, the power of representing, the power of transferring value is the creation of that power alone which can create a compulsory use. And as the pressure or necessity of this compulsory use increases, so increases the value of the thing required to discharge it, and the sacrifice of property, labor, and services to obtain it.

If we propose to reason upon this subject we must consider the function of money separated from the thing to which it is attached. What is the office and function of money? It is to represent and to transfer values. How was it created? By a compulsory use. What compulsory use? A compulsory use to meet the exactions of government. What are the exactions of government? They are coextensive with all service, with a man's life in time of war, with his debts of every kind and description, with the taxes imposed by government, and the innumerable and oppressive taxes collected by corporations; and it is this quality of compulsory use, created by government and attached to some visible transferable thing, which constitutes money.

Mr. ALLEN. Fiat.

Mr. CALL. Call it what you please, there is the power, whether it be from use or from the exercise of positive legislation. These uses are apparently to the eye of reason more extensive than any and all others. They include the meeting of taxes imposed by government, the meeting of legal-tender obligations, or the obligations of private debt which may be discharged by legal tender, and innumerable taxes levied through franchise of different kinds on all labor, all service, and all consumption.

We have to start out, Mr. President, not by investigating what writers think was the cause of the revival of business after the discovery of the New World by Columbus, not by analogies drawn from the obscure records and the history of the Roman Empire, not by propositions that money is a measure of value like the yardstick in England, not that it is a standard which has a fixity of value, for there is no fixity of value in money. Money, like everything else, has a purchasing power to-day of one amount and to-morrow of another; it varies of necessity with the varying values of commodities of every kind. To-day your house will buy so much gold or so much silver, or so much of both. To-morrow it will buy so much less, be they legal-tender or not. So it is in its debt-paying power. This varies with the value of commodities. When the bonds proposed to be issued shall mature, the value of property, of commodities in their relation with each other, will determine the value of the gold or the silver which they may buy at that time, with which the bonds must be paid.

So in the argument on this subject in reference to the advisability of creating a legal-tender function and office in either gold or silver or both, the proposition must depend not upon the idea of fixity of value in relation to commodities, not upon the idea of its being a measure of value, not upon the question of the relative value of gold bullion to silver or silver bullion to gold—for that has nothing whatever to do with the question—not with the value of the original bullion of silver or of gold because the bullion gold or silver has not the function and office of money, its legal-tender quality. It matters not, therefore, what may be the relation between the value of gold bullion or silver bullion, because the law creates legal tenders and fixes the relation of that which it creates or destroys. There is no place in the argument and discussion of this subject; there is not, and can never be, any fixed relative value but that which the Government prescribes for a compulsory use, be it gold or be it silver. It is within the power which prescribes the compulsory use to say what and how it shall be discharged, whether by services rendered in the Army, the Navy, or in the civil Departments, or by the payment of so much gold, or so much silver, or so many Treasury notes.

What is the proposition upon which what is called the double ratio or the alternative right of payment of gold or silver rests? What is the idea upon which the theory and philosophy of what is called a double standard or the alternative use of either kind of money rests? What reason can we give in abstract and positive reasoning for the proposition that gold or silver in fixed proportions shall be the method of discharging debts, taxes, private and public obligations? Let us see. It is not because these two metals have a fixed value of themselves in relation to other things, for they have not; it is not because they have natural relations of value. These may be inducements for a preference for them or either of them over other things to attach the money function to them, but manifestly do not create it. It is that no policy of government, no system of monopolies, no restrictions of trade, no combinations shall be able to control the legal-tender money function and office. It is to protect the money of the country, whatever it be, whether gold or silver, iron or copper, or Treasury notes, from combinations which will gather and accumulate it in the hands of a few persons. That is the theory, whether it be true or false, upon which the double use, the alternative use, the optional right to use either gold or silver must rest.

Is it true or is it not? The experience of mankind has sanctioned it. Is it true that the Government may prescribe a compulsory use of gold or of silver, or of both, or of iron or of any other substance, and that that compulsory use is the necessity of paying the exactions of the Government? And are the exactions of the Government now and heretofore coextensive with all the demands and uses of life?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me that I may move an adjournment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CALL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator from Florida, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 30, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5108) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish eight pieces of condemned cannon to the Veteran Brigade, Grand Army of the Republic, Rochester, N. Y., and also four pieces of condemned cannon to the Brockport Soldiers' Monument Association, Brockport, N. Y.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to the Veteran Brigade, Grand Army of the Republic, Rochester, N. Y., eight pieces of condemned cannon for the purpose of decorating the burial lot in Mount Hope Cemetery and in the Holy Sepulcher Cemetery set apart for the exclusive use of the veteran soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion; also four pieces of condemned cannon for the Brockport Soldiers' Monument Association, an incorporated body at Brockport, N. Y., for the decoration of the soldiers and sailors' monument recently erected in that village: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I care to interpose objection, but I would like to ask my friend from New York a question for information. I notice that eight pieces of condemned cannon are asked for one organization and four for the other, making twelve in all. I wish to inquire of him how he is to dispose of eight pieces?

Now, the condemned cannon that are available for this purpose, I understand, are limited in number, and the rest of us want a chance at them. Four is the number that is usually granted by bills of this character; and it strikes me that the gentleman from New York is perhaps a little liberal in his demand.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, this request from the united organization of the Grand Army of the Republic in Monroe County, N. Y., is to mark the lines of these two cemetery lots—one in the Mount Hope Cemetery, a Protestant association, and the other in the Holy Sepulcher Cemetery, which is a Catholic institution. In each case 10,000 square feet of ground have been donated by the cemetery authorities to be used solely as a burial place for the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. Each lot is proposed to be marked by placing a cannon at each of the four corners.

The companies and regiments represented in what is called the Veteran Brigade are composed of some of the bravest men who went to the front during the war of the rebellion. The old Thirteenth Regiment was among the first who went to the front, and did service at the battle of Bull Run. The One hundred and eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers was at Antietam and was badly cut up in that engagement. The One hundred and fortieth started to the front immediately upon the receipt of the news of the battle of Antietam. There are other brave and valiant regiments represented as well in the organization.

I believe this is the only case in which my district has asked for such a donation, and I hope it will not be refused.

The other part of the bill asking four condemned cannon for the village of Brockport is of a similar nature. It is a thriving village of 2,500 inhabitants, and has a large number of veterans in the village and neighborhood.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the resolution which he asks to have adopted now has been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir; it has not.

Mr. DALZELL. How many cannon are you asking for?

Mr. BREWSTER. Twelve in all. There are three cemeteries to be marked.

Mr. PICKLER. Do you think these cannon will go around among us all if this rate of distribution is maintained?

Mr. BREWSTER. I think that if every organization of this country is as worthy to have a donation of this kind as the one for which I am now asking, we can well afford to manufacture condemned cannon expressly for that purpose, and enough to go around. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, I object to the immediate consideration of the resolution, simply for the reason that I believe the gentleman from New York is asking too much.

We have in the State and city in which I reside a part of our large cemetery set aside for the burial of the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, of which I am a member myself. The cemeteries all through the State of Michigan, in the different towns and cities, you will find in the same condition; and if you give twelve condemned cannon to each separate village in one State, the rest of us are not going to be able to get anything for ours. I think it is altogether too much to ask, and I shall certainly object to it.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the gentleman will withdraw the objection to the present consideration of the bill, I will consent to have it cut down to eight.

Mr. MILNES. Cut it down to four, and then I will withdraw the objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 360) for the relief of Northrup & Chick;

A bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller; and

A bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, Homen, N. Dak.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. Frederick Remann, late a member-elect of the House of Representatives from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A bill (S. 360) for the relief of Northrup & Chick—to the Committee on Claims;

A bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller—to the Committee on Claims; and

A bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, of Homen, N. Dak.—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to make a change of reference of a bill. On the 27th instant I introduced a bill to incorporate the National University of the District of Columbia. By inadvertence, I think, it was referred to the Committee on Education. It has been usual to refer such bills to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I ask that the Committee on Education be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition for a national university, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the name of it, but it is purely a local institution in the District of Columbia. It does not apply outside of the District. It simply takes that name within the District, and the bill limits it to the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

PRESUMPTION OF DEATH IN PENSION CASES.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 162) amending section 3 of the act of June 27, 1890, relative to invalid pensions.

The bill was read at length. It provides for an amendment of the act of June 27, 1890, that in considering claims filed the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing his continued absence for a period of at least seven years, during which no intelligence of his existence shall have been received.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been read?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BREWSTER] has consented to reduce the number of cannon asked for in his bill to four. In view of that fact I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BREWSTER. I consent to the reduction of the number to four cannon for the Veteran Brigade.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 14 the words "two pieces of condemned cannon to the John C. Campbell Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Harrison, Ohio, for the use of its cemetery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And four condemned cannon for the use of the Soldiers' Home, at Bennington, Vt.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to discuss the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I have for a long time been voting for these resolutions, sending these pieces of artillery over the country to different institutions. I believe the time has come when we should all have our share; and it seems to me that instead of dealing out these condemned cannon to this post and that post of the Grand Army of the Republic, preceding that, we ought to have six pieces at least for the department of the Grand Army of the Republic in each State and Territory, for the department, as a department, to use. Then, if there are other cannon still remaining, these separate posts might come in. It seems to me that it is more equitable that each department of the Grand Army of the Republic, in each State and Territory where it is organized—and I think it is organized everywhere—shall have six pieces of condemned cannon. I offer that as an amendment. That will distribute these cannon over the country, and not collect them in a few places. It seems to me that should be done preceding the giving of cannon to special posts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move that as a substitute?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; I move that as a substitute.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to donate to each department of the Grand Army of the Republic of each State and Territory six pieces of condemned cannon for the use of those organizations.

Mr. FLYNN. I have an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the proposition which has just been read?

The SPEAKER. It is a substitute for the entire bill. That being so, the word "provided" should be stricken out.

Mr. PICKLER. Let that be stricken out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The House must be in order. The gentleman from Ohio will state his point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is stating a point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Speaker has disposed of the point of order by obtaining silence. Now I desire to make a motion to commit this resolution and pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. To what committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to commit this resolution and pending amendments to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I would like to have just one minute to say that I fully agree with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER,] that there ought not to be an indiscriminate reaching out for this material. The committee will then have an opportunity to hear every one upon that subject and properly dispose of the question.

Mr. PICKLER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the bill, with the pending amendments, be committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PICKLER. Is that debatable?

Mr. DINGLEY (to Mr. GROSVENOR). It should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], as I did not understand what arm of the service these cannon had to come from, I change it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the pending bill, with the amendments, be committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That is the question now before the House.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the proposition should include the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War. I have consulted both Secretaries, and they have told me that they both have some cannon of this description.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PICKLER. I want cannon that will shoot. [Laughter.] Some of these gentlemen want cannon only for decoration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there might be some difficulty as to what committee to send it to if both branches of the service were included.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to ask the gentleman from South Dakota a question.

Mr. PICKLER. I only desire to say in connection with this resolution that if the committee should see proper to recommend the bill, the purpose of which would be to turn them over to the department of the Grand Army of your State, they could do what they liked with your artillery. They could put them up before the State encampment, or they could locate them as they chose. It seems to me that there would be no objection at all to that kind of a distribution. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this proposition to allow each State department six condemned cannon may work injustice to many States that have large departments, while others only have small departments. If you are going to divide these condemned cannon, it should be done proportionately and equitably among the representatives of the Grand Army of the country; there ought to be some different division than the radical six to each State department. I would like to make some suggestion or amendment by which the committee having charge of this resolution should first ascertain how many condemned cannon there are available for this purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. They will do that naturally.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not know. This resolution presumes that there are at least 400 or 500 condemned cannon existing, when there is no information before the House that there is any condemned cannon.

Mr. BOWERS. There are 500 or 600 pieces, I want to assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania, lying at Mare Island Navy-Yard, Cal. I went through them with an officer——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. They must have been very small bore then. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BOWERS. They were of small bore and of large bore; some were columbiads and some were rifled cannon that will shoot. There are 500 or 600 of them. I want to say that they are pretty nearly all of large bore. I went over that yard where these cannon are piled up, and many of these cannon are new. I asked the officer what they intended to do with these cannon. He said they would be sold by auction. I asked him how much they would bring? He answered, "Nothing, probably;" that it would cost more for dynamite to blow them to pieces so that they could be used for something else than they would realize. Now, there are hundreds of cannon lying there that may be disposed of just as well as not.

Mr. PICKLER. Even enough for Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is all right, if there are plenty of them of sufficient caliber to permit the gentleman to go through.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the House is being led to do an unfair thing. My colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BREWSTER], asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, after modifying it to meet every objection, so that it should give four condemned cannon to a Grand Army post in his district. Then the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] was recognized to offer an amendment to donate four cannon to his district. Then the gentleman from South Dakota comes in with a general amendment, and a motion is made to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Naval Affairs or Military Affairs, or to some other committee.

Now, the gentleman from South Dakota can reach his object by simply sitting down and introducing a bill and having it referred to a committee. I submit to his sense of fairness that he ought not to come in now with such an amendment, in order to defeat this bill, that is offered by my colleague after he has obtained unanimous consent of the House for its present consideration. I hope that he will withdraw his amendment, and that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion to send it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that the gentleman from South Dakota will introduce a bill on the general subject, and refer it to a committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to make an explanation. I have no objection to the passage of this bill or of the amendment. I am in favor of it; but the House will see what sort of a condition we are going to get into. I have an amendment here that I want to offer. There are probably twenty-five or thirty other amendments that gentlemen desire to offer. My purpose is to send this bill to the Naval Committee, and then it will have the whole subject before it. It can then ascertain the number of cannon there are that can yet be donated; they will ascertain who have already obtained those cannon; and then they will be in a position to adjust the whole matter equitably and fairly.

Mr. PAYNE. I submit to the gentleman that he ought to introduce his bill separately and send it to the committee, and not seek to deprive my colleague of the benefit of his superior diligence in getting action at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from New York knows that if that measure is pressed for hearing now, these amendments will be piled upon it one after another and they will all be adopted, and we shall have a promiscuous distribution of these cannon without anybody knowing just what we are doing.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, there has been a "promiscuous distribution" for many years, and my colleague desires now to have the privilege of a small distribution for his district, and I think we ought to let him have it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is not debatable.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, according to my understanding of the case, there will be a large number of these cannon left after you have made the distribution that I ask for of six to each State and Territory, and then I am in favor of the proposition that the committee shall take the whole subject into consideration, shall inquire where these cannon have been granted for the last three or four years, and then, after this equitable distribution to each State and Territory is made, let the committee report to the House how many cannon there are remaining, with any recommendations they choose to make. Now, as to this particular case the gentleman from New York asks for four, and how many does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] desire?

Mr. GROUT. I desire four for the soldiers' monument at Bennington.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on granting those eight cannon.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The motion of Mr. GROSVENOR was adopted, and the bill, with the pending amendments, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman withdraw that demand for a moment?

Mr. CRISP. We have never had the regular order at this session of Congress, and we would like to see what it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand, and let me present a resolution.

Mr. CRISP. I withdraw it.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford now in the Department of Justice.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby authorized to transfer to William Henry Clifford, of Portland, Me., a certain portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, painted by Charles Cole, now in the building of the Department of Justice.

Mr. DALZELL. One word in explanation of this resolution. There are now in the building of the Department of Justice two oil portraits of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, of the Supreme Court of the United States. One of them was presented to the Department by Justice Clifford himself. The other is a copy which he had made for his family and which he intended to remove from the Department, but which he failed to remove before his death. I hold in my hand a letter written by Mr. Olney when he was Attorney-General, and also a letter written by the present Attorney-General, approving of the passage of this resolution. It means simply the return to the family of the late Justice Clifford of property which belongs to them.

Mr. CRISP. I understand the gentleman to say that the portrait to be returned is a duplicate.

Mr. DALZELL. It is a duplicate.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for the morning hour.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees in their order.

When the Committee on the Public Lands was called,

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 189, which is on the House Calendar. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, we are confined to the House Calendar upon this call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, is this bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is not in Committee of the Whole. It is on the House Calendar.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report on this bill be read.

The report (by Mr. UNDERWOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 189) to amend an act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands, approved March 3, 1883, have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

Early in 1879 all the lands embraced in a large belt of territory in the State of Alabama were temporarily withheld from sale and disposal upon the report of a special agent of the Land Department that they were valuable for coal. The reservation of this body of lands led to the passage of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 487), providing—

"That within the State of Alabama all public lands, whether mineral or otherwise, shall be subject to disposal only as agricultural lands: Provided, however, That all lands which have heretofore been reported to the General Land Office as containing coal and iron shall first be offered at public sale."

It was supposed that by such offering the lands valuable for coal in said district would be purchased at public sale, and thus segregated from agricultural lands.

A considerable quantity of the lands within this territory are purely agricultural in character, and it is apparent that the act of March 3, 1883, has tended to delay the disposal of such lands to meritorious settlers whose claims can not be perfected until a public offering.

The committee thinks that such lands should be subject to entry as agricultural lands under the same conditions as to proof of the nonmineral character that is provided for by the homestead laws.

A similar bill (H. R. 195) had the approval of the Interior Department during the last Congress, and passed the House.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the report fully explains the purpose of the bill, which has been unanimously recommended by the committee and has the full approval of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SETTLERS UPON THE YANKTON RESERVATION, S. DAK.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, State of South Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That all settlers who made settlement under the homestead laws upon lands in the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, during the year 1895 are hereby granted leave of absence from such homestead for one year from and after the date of this act, and that by such absence such homestead settler shall not lose nor forfeit any right whatever.

SEC. 2. That any such homestead settler may avail himself of the benefits of this act by filing a notice with the local land office describing his land and date of settlement thereon, which notice shall be signed by the settler and attested by the register of the land office.

The report (by Mr. DOWNING) is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it pass with the following amendments:

Strike out the preamble.

Add the following proviso to the first section:

"Provided, That the settler shall not receive credit upon the period of actual residence required by law for the time he is absent hereunder."

The necessity for this legislation is clearly stated in the annexed communications from the Interior Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, does this bill refer to the public lands or to Indian lands?

Mr. LACEY. It refers to public lands. There is only one question involved in it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does it affect the Treasury in any way?

Mr. LACEY. It does not affect the Treasury. It simply grants leave of absence to the settlers on lands in this reservation. Their settlement was made too late in the season for them to plant a crop that year. Under the law, if they had planted a crop and it had failed they could have had leave of absence; but there is no provision of existing law applicable to a case where the settlers go upon the land too late to plant a crop for that year. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office both recommend that the leave of absence be granted, but that the period of absence shall not be computed as part of the five years.

Mr. PICKLER. These parties were late in making their entries on account of the lateness of the President's proclamation.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir; the proclamation was issued somewhat late, so that the entries made by these persons were too late to enable them to make a crop that season.

The question being taken on the amendment recommended in the report of the committee, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AFFIDAVITS IN LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. LACEY. I call up the bill (H. R. 1199) designating the officers before whom preliminary affidavits in entries of public lands may be executed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in initiating a claim to public land under any of the laws of the United States, the applicant may make the preliminary affidavits required before the register or the receiver, or some officer having a seal and authorized to administer oaths, in the land district in which the land is located, such affidavits to be filed with, or transmitted to, the register and receiver, with the fee and commissions, or other payments, required by law.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], that he may explain this bill.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I think the report of the committee sufficiently explains the bill. Its object is simply to facilitate business in the land office and to accommodate settlers who desire to initiate entries, by allowing them to make preliminary affidavits before any officer authorized to administer oaths. A bill similar in its terms to this was passed by the House in the last Congress. This measure has been repeatedly recommended by the Department, and, I think, under more than one Administration.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask whether under the present rules our committee can call up under this order a bill which has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. That can not be done.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask, then, whether it would be proper to ask unanimous consent for that purpose at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MCRAE. Do I understand the Chair to state that the rules have been so changed as not to allow consideration during this hour of any bill which is in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The language of the rule, unless the Chair is mistaken, is that bills entitled to be called up during this hour must have been reported on a previous day and must be on the House Calendar.

Mr. LACEY. We have exhausted the bills of our committee on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER proceeded with the call of committees.

PENSIONS.

Mr. POOLE (when the Committee on Invalid Pensions was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 162) amending section 3 of the act of June 27, 1890, relating to invalid pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," passed June 27, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"And provided further, That in considering claims filed under this act the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued absence of such enlisted man or officer from his home and family for a period of at least seven years, during which period no intelligence of his existence shall have been received."

Mr. POOLE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know how this bill comes before the House?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it is properly before the House. As the Chair understands, it comes under the provisions of Rule XXIV, which, under the head of "Order of business," provides that—

Each committee when called may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does this bill come up for consideration now?

The SPEAKER. It does, if it fulfills the requirements of the rule. The Chair understands it has been heretofore reported and is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. POOLE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in order.

Mr. POOLE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill:

"But no widow shall be entitled to the benefit of this proviso where it is shown that the disappearance or absence of her husband was caused by her criminal or unchaste conduct, or where the husband has left home in consequence of a criminal charge or under circumstances from which a desire to return could not be inferred or presumed. And any pension granted under this proviso shall cease upon proof that such officer or enlisted man is still living."

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, this bill changes the existing law in but a single respect. Under the present law a woman can not obtain a pension as a soldier's widow until she has absolutely proved the death of her husband. Experience has shown that in many cases it is impossible to make absolute proof of death. The common law as it prevails, I think, in every State of the Union with reference to the presumption of death after absence for seven years is not followed by the Pension Office. Although the life insurance companies accept as proof of death the fact of seven years' absence, it sometimes happens in the settlement of claims in the Pension Office that a woman claiming as a soldier's widow has been unable to obtain the little pension of $8 a month, although her husband has been absent and unheard of for fifteen, twenty, or even thirty years.

This bill simply provides that in the administration of the pension laws the death of the soldier shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Pensions as proved if he has satisfactory evidence that the soldier has been absent from home for seven years, during which time no tidings have been received from him. The amendment which I have offered appears to provide carefully for cases where the absence of the husband may have been on account of the fault of the wife. One provision of the amendment is that if the wife has been guilty of any unchaste or immoral conduct which may have been the cause of the husband's absence, the pension shall not be allowed. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment covers all possible claim that should be made against the bill; and I do not know that it is necessary for me to detain the House with any further explanation of its provisions.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask what the pending substitute is?

Mr. POOLE. There is no substitute; simply an amendment which I have offered.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask consent that the amendment be again reported.

There being no objection, the amendment was again read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not think that in the consideration of these pension questions this is the proper mode of legislating. If it be the desire of gentlemen on the other side of the House to amend the dependent act of June 27, 1890, then bring in a bill containing all the amendments sought to be incorporated upon that law; but do not bring in on separate occasions and on various mornings, without notice, these salient and important amendments to the existing statutes.

I am well aware, even while opposing these important alterations demanded by gentlemen or deemed advisable to the existing pension laws, that such opposition will be futile and that I shall be promptly voted down. But I should like to hear some argument adduced as to why the rule of evidence with reference to the presumption of death which has obtained for so many years—from time immemorial—should in reference to pension cases be abrogated and changed in this manner. The rule of evidence, as I understand it, that has been followed and observed by the Commissioner of Pensions in reference to the allowance of a pension is precisely the same rule as to the presumption of death which has obtained and has found favor in our courts and which has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. That rule is that there shall be no reasonable doubt as to the death of the decedent.

Now, I appeal to you as lawyers whether that be not the true rule. It leaves it to the discretion of the court. It leaves it for the judge to determine, upon all the evidence which shall be adduced in the particular case before him, whether there be or be not reasonable doubt as to the death of the party through whom the claim is set up.

The objections, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to this change, or proposed change, in the rule of evidence, is that you open the door wide to possible fraud. The rule which was laid down by our highest Federal court is a safe and a salutary one. It can be made to apply justly to every condition of affairs. The change advocated, however, in the pending bill opens the door to fraud, as I have stated, because by collusion or by intentional fraud you can well imagine that it may be made to appear that a party is dead when, as a matter of fact, he is living, though possibly concealed. Such cases come up daily. They are reported in the daily journals every week.

For these reasons I submit that we should not, without due consideration and without debate, without the bringing forward of a single reason that can appeal to a lawyer or to a layman—we should not arbitrarily change a rule of evidence which has prevailed for so long a time and which has proved so salutary in our court practice.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman think that it is the rule at common law, applied to a general case tried at common law, that it is incumbent on the party seeking to prove the death of an absent person to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the absence does establish the death of the party? Is it not the rule of evidence, on the contrary, whenever the absence is proven to exist under circumstances which tend to show the possibility of death, that that is sufficient in all cases, outside of a construction of the pension law, to establish the death of the party after a period of seven years?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, I do not think so. I think that the statement of the common law just made by the gentleman is erroneous. I understand the rule of evidence is that laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, that there must be no reasonable doubt as to the death of the decedent, because that is a jurisdictional fact. It is a condition precedent, and there must be no doubt as to the existence of that fact.

Mr. GRAFF. Is there any different rule applying to jurisdictional questions that does not apply to any other question; and is it not true that in New York administration is had upon the estate on proof that the decedent had been absent for a period of seven years under such circumstances as to show the probable death of the decedent, this probability established or decided by the preponderance of evidence?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to give instruction to the gentleman as to the various rulings of the courts or upon the law in general. The only question which I am considering this morning is the proposed amendment to the dependent pension act of June 27, 1890. I have heard no good reason given why the amendment should find favor. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if this amendment grows out of the recent ruling of the Interior Department in regard to Melinda L. Crider? In this instance it seems that the Secretary of the Interior rules that she must prove the death of her husband beyond a question of doubt, not allowing the common-law presumption of seven years' absence. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee upon this bill be read.

The SPEAKER. It may be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 162) to amend section 3 of the act of June 27, 1890, relating to invalid pensions, report as follows:

In the administration of the pension laws there seems to have been a lack of uniformity in the decisions upon the question of what evidence is required to prove the fact of death of the person through whom the title to pension obtains. In some cases the common-law presumption of death after an absence of seven years has been recognized, while in other cases this presumption has been substantially ignored.

In the comparatively recent case of Melinda L. Crider, the Secretary of the Interior laid down the following rule:

"Independent of absence for any period of time, it must be held in pension cases that the facts attending the absence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that the party is dead."—Decisions of Department of Interior in Pension Cases, Volume VII, page 462.

Under this decision, which is now recognized as binding by the officers of the Pension Bureau, many otherwise meritorious claims of widows and minor children under the act of June 27, 1890, have been rejected, and the claimants have either abandoned their claims or have applied to Congress for relief by private bill. The number of these private bills is constantly increasing and the time of the committees of Congress largely taken up by their consideration. It is believed that the bill under consideration and herewith reported will settle the practice in this class of pension cases without injustice to worthy claimants and at the same time relieve Congress of the burden of their consideration. The interests of the General Government seem to have been fully protected in the bill.

Your committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The purpose I had was to draw out the fact that this amendment was to meet this ruling by the Interior Department. I must confess that I think this ruling is a severe one, and it does not meet with my approbation.

I yield the time back to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. ERDMAN. This bill as it is now amended is, I think, entirely proper. I do not recognize the authority of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] to be the expounder of pension doctrine for all on this side. This bill practically conforms to the common-law rule, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], who objects to it, will examine it I think he will find that is the case. That is what we want and what we are willing to support.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to ask whether an amendment to the amendment would be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. BRUMM. In reading the amendment I find that it is very ambiguous, and there is a section in it which I can not understand. I have shown it to one or two other gentlemen, and they are unable to understand it. After the clause which reads—

Or where the husband has left home in consequence of a criminal charge—the following has been inserted in pencil—or under circumstances from which a desire to return could not be inferred or presumed.

It seems to me that is very ambiguous, and to me it is meaningless. I move, as an amendment to the amendment, the striking out of the last clause which I have read. I do that for the purpose of making the provision intelligible.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has any amendment to the printed bill been adopted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then is the question open for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The question is open for an amendment to the amendment. An amendment has been offered which is now pending, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] proposes to offer an amendment to the amendment, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. STEELE. I hope all amendments will be voted down.

Mr. GIBSON. The amendment striking out that last clause should be adopted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to say just this much. I shall detain the House only a few moments. There is no need of any amendment to this bill as it comes from the committee. It presents the simple rule of the common law. One of the presumptions of the common law, as I understand it, from which the adjudications in most of the States have grown up, is that the unexplained absence from home of an individual for seven years raises the presumption of his death, and that is exactly what ought to be the rule in these cases. We ought not to encumber this bill with any explanatory or defamatory amendments.

I want to give the House an illustration of the operation of the rule of the Pension Office. Let it be understood that I am not criticising any Administration. I do not know under what Administration the rule grew up. It has been enforced under more than one Administration. A case like this occurred in my own Congressional district. A gentleman who had held a high position in the Army, as high at least as that of lieutenant-colonel of a regiment, a man of spotless character, went to Baltimore in 1867 with two carloads of stock which he had bought on credit from his neighbors in large part.

He sold the stock at a profit; he drew his money, and said to his friends there, the stockmen, that he should take the Baltimore and Ohio train for home the next morning. He has never been heard of since. Something like eight years afterwards administration was granted in Ohio. The debts were settled as well as they could be. The entire estate was swept away. The widow's dower probably was apportioned to her, and an entire closing or settlement of his estate was made, and yet to-day his widow, helpless and dependent, is met constantly with the requirement: When, where, and under what circumstances did your husband die?

Mr. STEELE. And the pension not allowed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The pension has been rejected. Now, there is another fact I want to mention here. We have lived in the other States and seen that in the administration of estates this presumption of common law has grown up, and there is no necessity for any amendment. We will find the administration of the law itself thus settled will stand under this provision. One of these amendments gives an opportunity to any designing person to send out a drag net all through a man's life, for twenty or twenty-five years, to get some rumor that there was something connected with his disappearance that perhaps would explain his absence. There is no necessity for that, and the bill ought not to be loaded down with amendments of that character.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill and the committee to what seems to me to be a faulty expression in the bill itself. I presume the purpose of the bill is to fix the limit of seven years' absence as all that is necessary to establish the fact of death sufficiently for the granting of a pension. The way the bill reads that will not be accomplished. It says:

That in considering claims filed under this act, the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued absence of such enlisted man or officer from his home and family for a period of at least seven years.

With these words "at least" in, this act could only establish a minimum limit and not a maximum, and there would be nothing in it to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from requiring fourteen or twenty-one years. If the purpose be to establish a seven-year limit, the words "at least" should be taken out.

Mr. MILES. The committee accepts your suggestion to take out the words "at least," and consents that they be stricken out and the report of the committee be taken as without those words.

Mr. POOLE. I will accept that.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. With these words out, I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a letter I have just this moment received in regard to this matter from my distinguished predecessor on this floor, ex-Governor John D. Long, giving a case just in point.

Mr. MILES. Can that letter be read without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It can be read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MILES. Very well, if it be so understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, January 28, 1896.

DEAR MORSE: In Mrs. Quigley's case, in which I take a very earnest interest for the poor woman, it is evident that the only way is to get a correction of the war records where he is recorded as a deserter, when the fact is he was killed in the Seven Days' fight in August, 1862. Colonel Parsons, our State pension agent, says that you had better see Ainsworth, who is the War Department clerk in charge of those records, and lay before him the inclosed affidavits. I know both the affiants. They are neighbors of mine and entirely credible and worthy. I feel quite confident that you can get the record amended. It is one of the cruelest cases I know. A poor woman, in need, growing old, and refused a pension although her husband was killed, simply because his body was not found. How could it be found when our Army was defeated and driven back? He has never been heard of from that day to this, and how idle to call him a deserter. I have no interest in this except as a neighbor and townsman, and of course make no charge for services. I take pleasure in giving freely anything I can do. Please do see the thing righted on the records. If you can't do it there, get a bill through Congress.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN D. LONG.

Hon. E. A. MORSE, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read in my time an affidavit in connection with that letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Affidavit.]

STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS, County of Suffolk, ss:

In the matter of the claim for widow's pension No. 271881 of Susan H. Quigley, widow of Thomas F. Quigley, alias Francis W. Howard, of Company F, Eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteers.

Personally came before me, a notary public in and for aforesaid county and State, Susan H. Quigley, resident of Hingham, in the county of Plymouth, State of Massachusetts, who being duly sworn, declares in relation to the aforesaid claim as follows:

"I was married to the soldier in 1856. My late husband was killed in the army during the retreat from Fair Oaks battlefield in August, 1862. In July, 1864, I went to Albany, and called on Michael H. Donovan, captain of Company F, who kept a store on Washington street, in Albany, N. Y. I was informed by him that my husband was killed at Gaines Mills on Hampton roads, August 21, 1862. He also told me that it was useless for me to look for my late husband, as he was a dead man.

"He was a good husband, and always sent me his monthly pay for the use of myself and little boy, and I had many letters from him up to August, 1862.

"I believe the statement of Captain Donovan, and am satisfied it was the truth. The relations between myself and husband were such that had he lived I know he would have returned to his family.

"The above testimony was written at my dictation in the Massachusetts State pension office, and was not prompted by any written, printed, or verbal statement relating thereto.

"SUSAN H. QUIGLEY,
"Hersey St., Hingham."

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, Susan H. Quigley, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, and acquainted her with its contents before she executed the same.

I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said claim nor am I concerned in its prosecution.

Witness my hand and official seal this 21st day of January, 1896.

J. B. PARSONS, Notary Publie.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is not this affidavit that you have produced based on hearsay?

Mr. MORSE. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. This lady says that she saw Captain Donovan. Now, why do you not produce Captain Donovan's affidavit——

Mr. MORSE. I have several other affidavits.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York (continuing): Of the death of the man on the battlefield. If the man was killed in battle and Captain Donovan saw him, that would be all that would be necessary.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, this is a distressing case, and undoubtedly it is only one of thousands. This soldier died in battle and was buried like a soldier, but we can not prove it beyond the circumstantial evidence. I have myself seen a package of letters which this soldier wrote to his wife from the army. They were affectionate letters, showing that he loved his wife and child, and that his home was dear to him. The letters stopped, and she has not heard a word from him since for more than thirty years; yet the Commissioner of Pensions says that does not prove his death beyond a reasonable doubt. Nevertheless, there is not the slightest doubt that the man is dead, or that he was killed in battle. Captain Donovan himself is now dead, I believe, and that is the reason that an affidavit from him is not produced; but I have a second affidavit here by another witness who was present when this conversation took place between Captain Donovan and the widow, and she swears to the same thing, that Captain Donovan told the widow that her husband was dead, and it was idle for her to look for him any further.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will ask the gentleman whether it is not conceivable that parties might fabricate such statements? If this soldier was killed in battle, why was not that fact shown by affidavit before the death of Captain Donovan?

Mr. MORSE. I can not answer that question. I can simply say that there is no sort of doubt that the man is dead. My predecessor here, Governor Long, who is well known to all the older members of the House, is a neighbor of this widow. He knew the soldier and he knows the widow. The House has heard the Governor's letter which has been read from the Clerk's desk, and that distinguished gentleman certainly needs no introduction to this House or to the country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send up now to have read for information.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And provided further, That the same rule shall be applied to widows' applications under the general pension laws other than said act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know but that the committee have in view some other legislation which will obviate the necessity of this amendment, and that therefore they have limited the bill now before the House to widows' applications under the act of 1890; but if they have not some other such proposition in view, it seems to me that we ought now to amend this bill so as to include widows applying under the other pension laws. The widows of Mexican soldiers and the widows of soldiers of the Indian wars have just the same difficulties in proving the death of their husbands as widows applying under the act of 1890, and I think there should be no discrimination as against widows claiming under other acts. In the last Congress we had this same general question before us in certain cases, and it was frequently met by the passage of private bills, but I think it ought to be covered by some general provision of law. I therefore suggest this amendment, and I trust it will meet the approval of the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the gentleman's amendment, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. LACEY. I propose to amend the pending bill so as to include the cases of widows claiming pensions under other pension laws than the act of 1890.

Mr. PICKLER. The present bill, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE], who presents it here, was considered early by the committee and reported favorably. Since that time they had under consideration, in connection with the general subject of pension legislation, some bills making this provison apply to widows' pensions under all the existing pension laws. This bill, however, relates only to the act of 1890, and the committee believe that it is a good bill, and they do not see any reason why it should not be passed at this time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I merely suggest an amendment to the bill, providing that it shall apply to the claims of widows under other acts than that of 1890. If we adopt this amendment, and then amend the title of the bill, we shall have the whole ground covered and there will be no need to "make two bites of a cherry."

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, under the bill as introduced by me, and as we propose to amend it, any woman who is entitled to a pension can obtain it by complying with the requirements of the act of 1890. No matter when her husband disappeared, nor no matter what the circumstances were, if she can show dependence and merely can not prove the absolute death of the soldier, she will be entitled to a pension. It seems to me that the bill covers all desirable points. The fact is that in the adjudication of pensions in the Bureau a good many cases of this character have come up where the woman could not prove absolutely the death of the soldier.

In this Congress we have had cases of that kind before the committee. We had one case where the soldier had been absent for nearly or quite thirty years. He had been discharged from the army for heart disease and he disappeared early in the spring of 1866. It was proved to the satisfaction of the committee that he and his wife had lived in amicable relations and had never had any quarrel, and also that since his disappearance his wife had been living continuously with her husband's relatives, thus showing no feeling on their part toward her but one of kindness. Now, in that case, the widow proving these facts and also showing that she was about 60 years of age and that she was absolutely dependent upon her own efforts for her support, her claim was yet rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, simply upon the ground that, under the existing law, there is no rule by which the office can allow a pension in such a case. This bill seeks to avoid that difficulty and to give this poor woman and others like her who have waited all these years whatever relief the act of 1890 may afford them. That is all there is to the bill. It has been carefully prepared. It has been drawn in such a way, with the amendment, that if any woman has been guilty of immoral conduct she shall not receive the benefit of the act, and it also provides that where the soldier himself was guilty of some criminal act and left home in order to avoid punishment therefor his widow shall not receive a pension. The bill simply provides that absence for seven years without any knowledge by the widow of the soldier's whereabouts shall be held to be sufficient to justify the office in granting her pension when the other conditions of the law are complied with.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has my friend explained his amendment?

Mr. POOLE. I have not the amendment here. It is at the Clerk's desk, and I should like to have it read again.

The SPEAKER. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] pending? The Chair did not understand the gentleman to offer the amendment, but only to intimate his intention to offer it.

Mr. BRUMM. I offered it, Mr. Speaker, and it certainly is pending. I have not withdrawn it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have the Clerk read the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE], and also that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. My amendment is simply to strike out a part of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move as a substitute for the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment, to insert in the thirteenth line of the second page, before the word "absence," the word "unexplained," in lieu of the word "continued."

Mr. Speaker, if this substitute be adopted, it will bring the rule of the Pension Office in these cases into harmony with that of the common law, which is to the effect that unexplained absence for a period of seven years creates the presumption of death. This will cover fully the ground sought to be covered by the amendment of the gentleman from New York and that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If it is true in any case that the soldier has absented himself on account of some criminal charge, that explains his absence—the absence is not unexplained. Or, if his absence is owing to unchaste conduct on the part of his wife, or domestic or business difficulties, his absence is not unexplained. I am satisfied if this substitute be adopted the common-law rule now generally prevailing will be correctly stated.

Mr. STEELE. Is there not some danger that under this amendment the War Department may hold that the absence of the soldier is explained by assuming that he was a deserter?

Mr. WOOD. There is always danger of an unfriendly construction of any law——

Mr. STEELE. And unfriendly construction now obtains.

Mr. WOOD. Whatever may be the words used in the law, there is the same danger of unfriendly construction.

Mr. STEELE. Let me illustrate such cases as I have in my mind. When the roll is called immediately after a battle it shows the absence of Smith or Jones or other soldiers carried on the roll; and they are necessarily marked as "absent," because the officers coming out of battle and leaving the field are unable to account positively for the absence of the men who do not answer to the roll call. Now, when the regiment is mustered out, that word "absent" may stand opposite the name of a soldier who has not been heard of since a certain battle. Under the construction of the War Department every man who is marked "absent" when his record is made up is regarded as a deserter, although the commanding officer of the soldier may never have intended so to mark him, because if he had so intended he would have inserted in the report that Smith or Jones had deserted. The officer in returning the soldier as "absent" does not pretend to account for his absence, because he can not do so. In his own mind he may feel sure that the soldier was killed in battle, notwithstanding the fact that no one is able to say that he saw him killed.

Mr. MAHON. Is it not the fact that soldiers who can not be accounted for after a battle are marked "missing," and that no one is marked by an officer "absent" unless he is absent without leave?

Mr. STEELE. It makes no difference whether the man is marked "missing" or "absent," he is still regarded as a deserter.

Mr. MAHON. Not when he is marked "missing."

Mr. STEELE. Yes, as I am informed, he is regarded as a deserter whether he is marked "missing" or "absent."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is an amendment to the substitute. There was an amendment, then an amendment to the amendment, and then a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] proposes a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But that was before the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. "The gentleman from Indiana" has offered no amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. We are not proceeding in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. I believe the gentleman from Indiana was asking me a question, not offering an amendment.

Mr. STEELE. That was all.

Mr. WOOD. In answer to that question, I merely desire to say it is true that men have been reported as "absent" or "missing" when in point of fact they have been killed.

Mr. MORSE. I know that there are such cases.

Mr. WOOD. It is also true that under this amendment the unexplained absence of such a person for seven years would raise the presumption that he was dead. It is also true to my own personal knowledge that men have been reported "killed in action" by mistake, who afterwards appeared; and now the question arises, should the same rule of evidence apply in the consideration of pension cases that applies in the consideration of other cases before our courts? The rule of evidence now in force in the Pension Office is to require the proof of death beyond a reasonable doubt, thereby departing from the rule at common law. The rule at common law—perhaps I do not state it perfectly accurate, but sufficiently so—is that the unexplained absence for a period of seven years of the party raises the presumption of death. I think it ought to be satisfactory to leave the construction of the pension law and the matter of evidence under it, in all questions of death, where it is left in the settlement of estates, where often many greater interests, in point of dollars and cents, are involved than in the mere matter of a pension.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman allow me to interject in his remarks a brief statement of the actual decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this very point?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. I read from the case of Davy vs. Brooks (97 United States Reports):

A person who for seven years has not been heard of by those who, had he been living, would naturally have heard of him, is presumed to be dead.

Mr. WOOD. I understand that to be substantially "unexplained absence." If a person had been heard of during the seven years there is no "unexplained absence." It is impossible, as the gentleman knows, in any law, to state in exact language as used in opinions of the Supreme Court just the construction which should be given to it; and I believe that one single word—and that the word "unexplained"—will cover the amendment and the substitute, and correct what is an injustice in the rule of evidence in proving death in pension cases, as the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior hold the rule to be.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD], and for quite an important reason.

The rule, I will state, in the absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], who explained to me what the rule was in response to my interrogatory—but in his absence we are compelled to resort to a less authentic or competent authority—I refer to Greenleaf on Evidence—— [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. "The gentleman from New York" is here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. I read from section 278, on page 275 of Volume II of Greenleaf on Evidence:

But however this may be—

He is referring now to the presumption of life, treated of in the preceding paragraph—

But however this may be, as a mere presumption of law, the rule is now settled for most judicial purposes that the presumption of life, with respect to persons of whom no account can be given, ends at the expiration of seven years from the time they were last known to be living—

And this last clause, to which I will now call your attention, is, in my judgment, the important feature—after which the burden of proof is devolved on the party asserting the life of the individual in question.

And it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] throws the burden of proof not on the pensioner, but on the person attacking the right of the widow to a pension after she has sufficiently established the unexplained absence of the husband for a period of seven years. Thus by the adoption of this amendment to the bill the widow is not bound to go further than the simple proof of the unexplained absence, leaving the burden on the party attacking the pension to show circumstances which would rebut that presumption. That is the reason I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

I believe that the right position in regard to the pension laws, as coming from this side of the House, should be on the line, and we should defend our position on that line, that we are simply bringing the soldier back to his rights under the common law, and permitting his rights under the pension laws of the United States to be weighed by the same principles and by the same doctrines that have been established for the settlement or determination of human rights in every other forum. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I think it would be perhaps advisable that we should fully understand the actual situation and what the amendments and substitute mean. As I understand it, and I have taken some pains to inquire, the bill is entirely satisfactory without the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which has been read, and without the amendment to that amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as the substitute for both offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD]. In other words, as I have said, the bill seems to be entirely satisfactory as it came from the committee.

The amendment first offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] is as follows:

But no widow shall be entitled to the benefit of this proviso where it is shown that the disappearance or absence of her husband was caused by her criminal or unchaste conduct, and so forth.

It seems to me that amendment ought not to prevail. In any case of that kind the courts are open for redress to the husband, and this gives an opportunity to prevent a woman getting a pension, perhaps, who might be entirely innocent of any charge, or crime, or suspicion of that character; but somebody in the Pension Office might think, from some letter received, or some gossip, that possibly reasons might exist which would bar the woman from a pension. I am not willing, for one, to subject the women of this country to that sort of reflection. I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] is not pressing it, but that he is willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. POOLE. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand my colleague [Mr. BRUMM] is willing to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. POOLE. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] is a good one.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. These two amendments being withdrawn, the matter of the substitute might come in as an amendment, I think, without much objection. The bill would then read, if the substitute was agreed to, as an amendment:

And provided further, That in considering claims filed under this act the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the unexplained absence of such enlisted man or officer from his home and family for a period of seven years, during which period no intelligence of his existence shall have been received.

I think that is very proper, and I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. POOLE. I am willing to withdraw it if I have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] to be withdrawn. The question, then, is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the word "continued" in line 13, and substitute the word "unexplained," and to strike out the words "at least" in line 15.

Mr. GROW. Will the Clerk read the amendment now pending or the bill as it would read if amended?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania requests that the section be read as it will stand if the amendment is agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That in considering claims filed under this act the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the unexplained absence of such enlisted man or officer from his home and family for a period of seven years, during which period no intelligence of his existence shall have been received.

Mr. LACEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And also provided further, That the same rule shall be applied to widows' applications under the general pension laws other than said act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. POOLE. I think the Committee on Invalid Pensions will accept that.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is on another subject. This is a bill to amend the act of 1890, and if you adopt the amendment in this form you will have a very complicated law.

Mr. GROW. I will make the motion I made in the first place, that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Then I trust the committee will report a bill without any amendments which can be promptly passed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand the matter, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] was adopted.

The SPEAKER. It was not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then the bill is before the House without any amendments having been adopted. What amendment is now pending?

The SPEAKER. The amendment is the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] to strike out the word "continued" and substitute the word "unexplained" in line 13, and to strike out the words "at least" in line 15.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is that the question upon which the House comes to a vote?

The SPEAKER. That was the question on which the House was dividing when the gentleman from Iowa proposed an amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] moves to recommit to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which motion is in order, and is now pending before the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. One further inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for me to move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 5.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that there is no quorum present. [After a count.] One hundred and twenty-seven gentlemen are present; not a quorum.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as it is very evident that there will be difficulty in obtaining a quorum, a number of gentlemen having gone home, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State of the 28th instant, submitting an estimate of appropriation to pay the salary account of Mr. Matt W. Ransom, United States minister to Mexico, from July 1 to August 28, 1895, amounting to $2,805.70; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the legislature of the State of Washington, praying that an appropriation be made to improve and render navigable the Okanogan River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Washington:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, J. H. Price, secretary of state of the State of Washington, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of the house memorial No. 21 with the original now on file in this office and find the same to be a true and perfect copy thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Washington.

Done at Olympia, this 21st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1896.

J. H. PRICE, Secretary of State.

House memorial No. 21.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the house of representatives and senate of the State of Washington, in legislature assembled, most respectfully represent:

Whereas it has been ascertained by careful inspection that the Okanogan River from its confluence with the Columbia River, near Bridgeport, in Douglas County, State of Washington, to the State line, a distance of about 75 miles, can, with moderate expense, be rendered navigable for boats of about 3 feet draft; and

Whereas the country tributary to the said river is one of vast mineral and agricultural resources, and is now without steam transportation facilities; and

Whereas the cost of freighting by wagon renders all traffic and trade expensive; and

Whereas by rendering the Okanogan River navigable a continuous waterway will be made over the Columbia and Okanogan rivers from Wenatchee, on the Great Northern Railway, to the northern boundary of the State of Washington, a distance of about 160 miles, thereby making possible a much cheaper mode of transporting the machinery, tools, and supplies necessary for the development of the said mineral and agricultural resources into and the product of the mines, farms, and orchards out of the country tributary to the said Okanogan River than is now had: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, your memorialists, would respectfully urge that immediate action be taken, and that a sufficient amount be included in the next river and harbor appropriation bill for the purpose of making the improvements necessary to open the said river, and that a copy of this memorial be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House; and thus will your memorialists ever pray.

Passed the house March 9, 1895.

ELLIS MORRISON, Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate March 12, 1895.

F. H. LUCE, President of the Senate.

(Indorsed:) House memorial No. 21. Memorializing Congress to make an appropriation of sufficient money to improve and render navigable the Okanogan River, in the State of Washington. Filed in the office of the secretary of state March 14, 1895. J. H. Price, secretary of state.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego, Cal., praying for the speedy completion of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Haddonfield, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to the American missions in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAKER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Leavenworth, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Missouri, praying that the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, be extended so as to include all the officers and privates of Col. Thomas Kimball's regiment; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented petitions of the city council of Hoquiam; of the city council of Ballard; of the town council of Kalama, and of the city council of Centralia, all in the State of Washington, praying for the speedy completion of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. IRBY presented sundry petitions of citizens of Orangeburg, Williamsburg, and Marion, all in the State of South Carolina, praying that an appropriation be made for deepening Winyah Bay bar in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the town council of Kalama, Wash., and a petition of the town council of Hamilton, Wash., representing the desirability of the speedy construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of our Government, for the benefit of the whole country, under such conditions as will secure low tolls without discrimination and free from the abuses which have attended franchises granted to inland transportation companies. I move that the petitions be referred to the Select Committee on Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition signed by hundreds of citizens of the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington. Many of these citizens are personally known to me. They represent that the prices fixed upon the town lots near the head of Port Angeles Bay, in the State of Washington, were very much greater than the actual values of the lots, the prices having been fixed by Government appraisers. It is represented that the settlers on these lots occupied the same for many years, for months in some instances, prior to the appraisements, and in the meantime made quite a number of improvements, all assuming that the prices of the lots would be reasonable. It is now ascertained that the prices are too great, and the settlers have made due proof before the proper officers of their residence and as to their improvements, and none of them can really afford to pay the prices at which the lots are held, and they ask that the prices of the lots be reduced. I have introduced a bill for the purpose. I believe the petition is worthy of attention and that these settlers are entitled to relief. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. GRAY presented the affidavit of Samuel Alrichs, of Delaware, in the matter of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the United States Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

I ask that the report and bill as proposed to be amended be printed, and give notice that probably to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill. It is important that it shall be passed this week.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 935) to require patents to be issued to land actually settled under the act entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of Florida," approved August 4, 1842, to report it adversely and request its indefinite postponement, this bill having the same purpose in view as the one just reported favorably.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1424) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891, reported it with an amendment.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS OF 1893.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment, submitting a report thereon; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1896.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY PRINTING.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Printing I report back without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to extend the provisions of section 79 of the act named to the monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey which were published during the year 1894, and to those which have been published since that year, and to those which may be published in the future. But nothing therein contained shall be construed to interfere with the distribution of memoirs and reports, so far as the same is provided for by the joint resolution "To distribute copies of special memoirs and reports of the United States Geological Survey," approved March 3, 1887.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the report which accompanies the joint resolution may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule.

CHAPLAIN AT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, to report it with amendments, and an amendment to the title to indicate the purpose of the bill. The bill provides a chaplain for the Military Academy, and as there is a vacancy now, and all concerned desire very much to have some changes made before the new chaplain shall be appointed, the committee said I might ask the Senate to consider the bill immediately. I do so.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs were, in line 10, after the word "clergyman," to strike out the words "from civil life"; in lines 10 and 11 to strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert "President"; and in line 14, at the end of the bill, to strike out "captain mounted" and insert "professor"; so as to make the bill read:

That so much of section 1309 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for the appointment at the United States Military Academy at West Point of "one chaplain, who shall also be professor of history, geography, and ethics, and one assistant professor of the same," is hereby repealed: Provided, That the duties of chaplain at the Military Academy shall hereafter be performed by a clergyman to be appointed by the President for a term of four years, and the said chaplain shall be eligible for reappointment for an additional term or terms, and shall, while so serving, receive the same pay and allowances as are now allowed to a professor.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. It is always difficult to understand how a bill reads after some amendments have been made. Is there still left in the bill the provision that the chaplain is to be appointed for four years?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; that was considered desirable by the Academy. One amendment strikes out the provision that he shall be appointed from civil life, because that would have barred out all chaplains in the Army. Let them take their own chances with other citizens for appointment. Another strikes out, which is a mere formal amendment, the provision which authorizes the appointment by the Secretary of War, for of course it should be made by the President.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, providing a chaplain for the Military Academy.

Mr. HAWLEY. That there may be speedy final action upon the bill, I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. WALTHALL were appointed.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH TENNESSEE.

Mr. HAWLEY. In behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask an order to print certain testimony needed in an important matter before that committee concerning the settlement between the United States and the State of Tennessee in regard to some railroads.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs, 300 copies of the papers transmitted by the Secretary of War in response to the Senate resolution of December 11, 1895, regarding the claims and counter-claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and the State of Tennessee against the United States, in respect to the indebtedness of the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville, the Edgefield and Kentucky, the McMinnville and Manchester, and the Winchester and Alabama railroad companies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUBOIS in the chair). The Chair understands that the resolution will have to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask to have it considered now. I have had an estimate made of the cost. We have had the testimony reduced 270 pages, cutting it down to the smallest figure. It is to be printed for the use of the committee. The cost, as near as I can estimate it, will be about $380. I had an estimate made by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS. It is only where the cost exceeds $500 that a resolution to print must necessarily go to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 1842) granting a pension to Hannah Carrigan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1843) to relieve Albert Locke, alias Albert Shipley, from the charge of desertion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 1844) granting a pension to Cora I. Dexter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1845) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion against James Day, of Company M, Thirteenth Regiment New York Cavalry, and to grant him an honorable discharge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1846) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon to Custer Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Leavenworth, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 1847) granting a pension to Capt. John C. Heazlitt; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1848) to prohibit the purchase and use by the Government of the United States of prison-made wares, and for other purposes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the bill be read at length and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the Government of the United States shall not purchase or use or be directly or indirectly concerned in purchasing or using any wares manufactured in any penitentiary, workhouse, or other prison, or by convict labor.

SEC. 2. That any officer or agent of the Government of the United States who shall, as such officer or agent, purchase or use for the Government of the United States, or be concerned directly or indirectly as such officer or agent in the purchase or use of any such wares, or who shall, in his own name or in the name of another, purchase any such wares or sell or rent the same to the Government of the United States, or cause or permit the same to be used in the service of the Government of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on the conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than three months, and be adjudged to pay the costs of prosecution.

SEC. 3. All acts or parts of acts in any manner conflicting with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 1849) to authorize the pensioning of persons who, having served in the army or navy of the Confederate States of America, afterwards served in the Army or Navy of the United States, and were honorably discharged; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 1850) authorizing the restoration of the name of Thomas H. Carpenter, late captain, Seventeenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1851) to establish a military post at or near the city of Grand Forks, in Grand Forks County, in the State of North Dakota; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In this connection, I will state that the same bill was introduced by me at the opening of the session, and by some inadvertence it was reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs unfavorably, instead of having been referred to the Secretary of War, as is usual in such cases. I reintroduce the bill on that account. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann Little; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1853) for the relief of Edward Rice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1854) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Thomas Collins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1855) for increase of pension to George Hayes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced a bill (S. 1856) for the relief of the heirs at law of John Schwartzenburg, deceased, of Rapides Parish, State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHILTON introduced a bill (S. 1857) granting a pension to Nathan Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VILAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Ambrose Simpson, introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. GEAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads be, and is hereby, authorized in the course of the inquiries which are being made to employ a stenographer and messenger, and that the expenses of the same be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

INDEPENDENCE NATIONAL BANK OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. QUAY. At this point I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the bill (S. 285) for the relief of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa. It is merely intended to supply the want of a lost check, destroyed or lost in the mail last May. It is recommended by the Treasury Department.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to instruct V. McNally, ordnance officer, United States Army, to issue a duplicate of the original check described in the preamble to the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa., under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

SALARY BALANCE OF THE LATE JUSTICE MILLER.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1582) to pay to the widow of the late Samuel F. Miller, a justice of the Supreme Court, a sum equal to the balance of his salary for the year in which he died. I wish to state that Judge Miller died and left his widow a house, and only a house. It is on Massachusetts avenue, and upon it there is a mortgage of $10,000. The annual tax is $300. She really has not means outside of this payment to pay for her board or clothing. I think there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the widow of the late Samuel F. Miller, a justice of the Supreme Court, the sum of $7,419, being equal to the balance of his salary for the year in which he died.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 189) to repeal an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; and

A bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 650) to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that several Senators are prepared to go on and discuss the joint resolution, and I hope the Senate will consent to consider it at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PEFFER. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] desires to make some further remarks on the resolution, as does also the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I will ask if either of the Senators is ready to proceed this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the request of the Senator from North Dakota for the present consideration of the joint resolution which has been read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to make an explanation of the attitude of this case, so that the real merits of the controversy may be fully understood by the Senate. There has been a great misapprehension as to the exact legal condition of this case and as to the legal duties of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture has been arraigned here rather bitterly, I think, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], for an alleged failure to carry out the law of Congress, and in undertaking to make that charge good he quoted some acts of Congress; but he failed to quote another act which very materially modifies the provisions of the act which he quoted.

I want to state to the Senate, as it may have passed out of their recollection, that the purchase and distribution of seeds by the Agricultural Department does not stand on the basis of a merely eleemosynary institution, that is, a purchase by the Government of seeds of any kind to be distributed gratuitously among the people of the United States as they may be selected by Senators and Representatives. That is the attitude of the law in reference to the purchase of seeds. That there may be no mistake about that, I will read to the Senate, so that everybody may understand it, the law which governs this case, being section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country—

I hope the Senate will note that up to that point in the statute no seed which is not rare and uncommon shall be purchased. Then, there is another description of seeds which may be purchased, to which I call the attention of the Senate—or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another.

The Secretary of Agriculture has no right under the law to purchase any seed unless it be embraced within one or the other of those descriptions—it must be "rare and uncommon," or it must be of that kind which "can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another."

The other day, when I had the honor to submit to the Senate some remarks on this subject, I asked the Senator from North Dakota to specify a single seed which was rare and uncommon which had not already been purchased by the Agricultural Department and distributed. He failed to answer; and so will every Senator who undertakes to make any criticism upon the action of the Secretary of Agriculture fail to make answer.

Now we come to the other provision:

Or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another.

Here I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the very important fact that the language of the statute is not to purchase "such seeds as may become more profitable by change from one part of the country to another," but "by frequent changes."

Let us see if that is the meaning of the statute; that is, the Secretary of Agriculture must find a seed which, for illustration, I will say, would become more profitable if frequently changed between the State of Florida and the State of Maine, that is, changed from the State of Florida to the State of Maine and back to the State of Maine from the State of Florida and back from the State of Florida to the State of Maine, and so on, until we arrive at the number of changes which would authorize us to call them "frequent." That is the language of the statute.

Now, I ask any Senator if he can point out any seed which, by frequent change from North to South or from East to West, from Florida to Maine, or from Kentucky to Ohio, or from Louisiana to North Dakota, and back again, will become more profitable? He can not find any, and that is all the kind of seed the Secretary is authorized to purchase. The language of the statute is:

The Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seed.

Mr. President, that is the direction of the statute to him. Who is to be the judge of the kind of seeds that are to be purchased under this statute? When you give the power to an officer to make a purchase of certain things which have in the judgment of men a particular value you necessarily confer upon that officer the power to determine that fact. It must be determined by somebody, and who is to determine it? I want to call the attention of the Senate to that. Is it the Senate of the United States, or is it the sworn officer of the Government whose duty it is to purchase? I suppose nobody can answer that.

We come now to the last act, and there is inserted another word not embraced in section 527. Section 527 confines the Secretary of Agriculture to rare and uncommon seeds, which can be made more profitable by frequent changes. If that stood alone it would be in the power of a Secretary of Agriculture who did not care how he disbursed the public money to purchase seeds utterly valueless to the community at large, provided only they were rare and uncommon.

Now we come to the acts which it is said the Secretary has not carried into effect. I read from the last appropriation act that clause which makes the appropriation:

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law—

That is, by section 527—

of valuable seeds.

There is another term. So, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, they must be not only either "rare and uncommon" or "such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," but they must possess another character, they must be "valuable." Valuable in what sense? Valuable to the agricultural and horticultural interests of the country.

Coming back to a suggestion made by the Senator who sits before me [Mr. ALLEN] to me sotto voce, who is to judge of the value? Is it the Senator from North Dakota, or a Senator from any other State, or is it the Senate of the United States? I take it there can be no controversy about where the power and the duty to judge is vested. I think now the Senate understands the kind of seed to which the Secretary of Agriculture is confined, and I think the Senate also understands that he is the judge of whether the seeds offered come up to this standard or not. I will, however, read, without comment, one more clause from the appropriation act of last year, which fortifies what I have said:

And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, etc.

So there is another restriction repeated in the very act of appropriation.

The Senator from North Dakota arraigns the Secretary of Agriculture for not complying with the law when he had made advertisement and found no bids which he ought to have accepted. The Senator said that the law compelled the Secretary of Agriculture to readvertise; and, to sustain that view, he read from the act of January 27, 1894, providing for advertisements, the last clause of which is:

And if any or all of such proposals shall be rejected, advertisements for proposals shall again be invited and proceeded with in the same manner.

And the Senator arraigned the Secretary of Agriculture because, having advertised, having received proposals, and none of them being satisfactory, all were rejected, he did not comply with the statute I have just read and which the Senator read the other day.

The Senator overlooked another statute passed at the same session of Congress, in April, when the first statute was passed in January. I now call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota and the Senate generally to the provisions of that statute:

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington—

That is the statute I have just read and commented on, and upon which the Senator relied—approved January 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the provisions thereof shall apply only to advertisements for proposals for fuel, ice, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies to be purchased at Washington for the use of the Executive Departments and other Government establishments therein named.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I shall be glad to yield right here.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Does the Senator from Mississippi hold that it is good sense to compel one Executive Department to readvertise for proposals and to allow another not to do so?

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is the question.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not here to answer as to the good sense of any provision of any statute. I am here simply to state to the Senate what the statute is, and the statute is as I have read it. If it be nonsense, as the Senator from North Dakota seems to think it is, nevertheless it is the law of the land, and I have yet to learn that any officer or any individual or anybody, organized or otherwise, has a right to annul a plain provision of a statute because that person, that officer, or that body may in his or its superior wisdom to the Legislature, the Congress of the United States, consider the provision nonsensical. That is my answer to the question propounded by the Senator.

So, now, we have it that the Secretary of Agriculture did, in accordance with law, section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, make his advertisement; had a board selected to pass upon the proposals; and, upon the unanimous judgment of that board, every single bid that was made was rejected, and then we have—and I want that understood—no provision of law which required the Secretary to readvertise.

Now, what is the complaint? The complaint is founded upon a misconstruction of the statute. That ought, it seems to me, to end this controversy. There is, however, one provision of the appropriation act to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, to show that it is not now in the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the act which this joint resolution proposes to make him carry out.

It is unnecessary for me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that our country is a very large one, extending over many degrees of latitude, almost from the tropics to, I believe, about the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude. We have fruits, seeds, trees, and shrubs adapted to one section of the country which are not adapted to another. We have, in addition to that, the beginning of the seasons for planting much earlier in one section of the country than in another. For instance, in Florida and the lower part of Louisiana gardening has already commenced; so in the lower part of Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, while in North Dakota the ground is probably covered by 2 or 3 feet of snow, and frozen. Congress recognized that, and so it provided what I am going to read now from the appropriation act of 1895:

Provided also, That the seeds allotted to the Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January, or at the earliest practicable time thereafter.

Congress there, recognizing this difference in latitude, this difference in the forwardness of the seasons between the South and the North, took the latitude of 32° as the dividing line, and said as to those south of that line that the Department should have the seed for them ready for distribution by the 10th day of January. This is the 30th of January. Suppose you pass this resolution, and suppose—which I think is hardly a supposable case, as I shall call the attention of the Senate to a provision of the Constitution directly—that the President of the United States so far forgot his duty to support, protect, and defend the Constitution as to approve it—suppose all that, then the purchases are to be made. It is now the 30th of January. Then, when the purchases are made, a long time, many weeks, must intervene, as shown by the Secretary in his statement, before the seed can be properly assorted, packed, and distributed, which would bring us probably to the 1st of March. Then what becomes of the "fair distribution" of the seed intended to be accomplished under this act of Congress? It would be too late for all the Southern part of our country. We have, then, what? We have a partial, unfair, unequal distribution, contrary to the statute, which this joint resolution falsely alleges it is designed to have carried into effect. I think the Senator will not take any such position as that.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator from Mississippi is now making a legal argument. Does the Senator from Mississippi claim that there is any rule of law by which an officer charged with the discharge of a public duty failing to discharge the duty within the time provided by the statute is thereafter as to that law discharged?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; but I do say that if the statute is framed so that the act required to be done in order to be effectual must be done by a certain day, then no power on earth, neither the officer nor anybody else, can make it be performed afterwards.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose there is time enough, however, I suggest to the Senator, by which the officer can partially execute the law, although there may not be sufficient time to execute it in its entirety, would the Senator from Mississippi, under such circumstances, claim that the officer would be exempt from its partial execution?

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that question is contained in the statute. If a policy is indicated in the statute, not for partial distribution, but for perfect and whole distribution in order to be equal and just and fair, then I say that this partial distribution, which is against the positive provisions of the statute and the policy of the statute, as being unequal and unfair, should not be made.

Mr. President, we have arrived at this point so far in the argument, first, that the Secretary of Agriculture has no right to buy anything except the peculiar kinds of seed mentioned in the statute—in other words, the statute says that he shall be confined to those purchases; second, by the law he is made the judge of whether the seeds offered are the kinds mentioned. That is a fact. Third, that there was a misconception, a gross misconception, on the part of the prosecutors in this case as to the duties of the Secretary of Agriculture after having made his advertisement. They proceeded under a statute which in the same session of Congress was repealed or so modified as not to apply to him, the statute which they rely upon applying only to the purchase of ice, fuel, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies in the city of Washington. Under this act he purchases neither seed, nor ice, nor fuel, nor any miscellaneous supplies in the city of Washington, but he purchases them under advertisement throughout the country.

There is one other provision to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate in aid of the argument I made the other day. I do not intend to elaborate it for the reason that I have good reason to know, or at least to believe, that a Senator who is much more competent to argue that proposition than I am will do so before this debate is over, but I want to read, lest the Senate may forget and may not read it or have their attention called to it, the extraordinary language used in this joint resolution:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

I say that is an unparalleled, unprecedented provision in a law, except where there has been a prior suspension of the law by an act of Congress. For instance, if this law had been suspended by act of Congress, as is done sometimes in about these words: "Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled so and so be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the further action of Congress"—when that is done, then it is competent for Congress to take up a suspension, and in taking up that suspension may use the language here used, but in no other case. What is that but a usurpation on the part of the Congress of the United States of a constitutional duty which is imposed on the President of the United States? I will read that part of the Constitution to the Senate. Article II, section 3, of the Constitution, in enumerating the various powers and duties of the President, says:

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

If Senators who argue in favor of this joint resolution will show me anything in it except an attempt upon the part of Congress to take care that this law be faithfully executed, I shall be very much obliged to them.

Mr. ALLEN rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to speak?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator. I was going to reply briefly to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall occupy the floor only a few minutes.

Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of this measure. It seemed to me that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] made a very frank and plain declaration of the facts involved in the proposed legislation. I have followed as attentively as I could the able legal argument of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and I have to confess at the outset that, being a layman, I am probably not qualified to estimate the argument of the Senator from Mississippi as I should wish to do. The Senator never speaks on a question of law without enlightening the Senate. I take it for granted that the abstruse legal propositions which he has laid down are possibly founded in fact; and yet, Mr. President, in behalf of the farmers of this country, I am willing to take a little chance on matters of strict legal construction, yes, even on constitutional questions, if it becomes necessary to do so to give the men who are toiling, as the farmers of this country are toiling to-day, under adverse conditions, to obtain a living from the soil, the benefit of every possible doubt.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say our legislation is largely in the interest of the population of our cities and the wealthy men of our country. I am not one of those who decry or berate men simply because they have wealth, and I do not propose to do so now; but when we look around we discover the fact that Congress has not hesitated in former years, and when the Treasury is replenished probably will not hesitate in the years to come, to grant large sums of money to construct expensive public buildings in our cities. They are an ornament and a credit to the cities and an evidence of the liberality of Congress, but they are not for the benefit of the farmers of the country. We find that very large appropriations, millions upon millions of dollars, are made in every Congress for the improvement of harbors in our great cities, indirectly perhaps a benefit to the farmers, but more directly a benefit to the men engaged in business and commercial enterprises. Again, the Government expends large sums of money for the free delivery of letters to the urban population, while in the country the farmers have to reach the post-office after trials and tribulations, over hills and through valleys and snowdrifts, it may be, to get their letters. They are discriminated against in that respect, but I do not apprehend that we can pass any legislation which will give them relief in that regard.

In times past we have done this one little thing for the farmers. We have spent a small amount of money to enable them to procure from their Congressmen some seeds which otherwise they would not have had. It has been a burden, it seems, to some Congressmen to send the seed out; sometimes when I have been very busy with other matters it has been a burden to me, but it has nevertheless been a labor of love, as I believed it was a proper and just recognition of the farming interests of our country. It is said that the farmers can write to seed dealers and obtain the same seeds, and yet those of us who know something about farmers, and I claim to be something of a farmer myself, are aware of the fact that the farmer is not in a position, he has not the information always at hand, to enable him to do as it is said he could very readily do.

My own judgment leads me to the opinion, and I express it without qualification, that the seeds which have been sent from Washington to the farming communities of this country have given the population of our country towns a large variety of seeds, which has resulted in greatly improving the productions of their gardens and farms, and thus enabling the farmers to enjoy some of the luxuries which the rich man in the city finds no difficulty in obtaining at a store in the immediate vicinity of his home. I think it has been a wise, a judicious, and a sensible expenditure of money, and I am extremely anxious, not because the farmers in my State are clamorous to have this practice continued, but because I think it is just, that this small annual appropriation shall be continued for the benefit of the population in our country towns scattered throughout this great country.

That is all I care to say, Mr. President, on the question beyond calling attention to the fact that there is a proposed amendment to the joint resolution which it seems to me utterly emasculates it, and which I trust when the vote is taken will not be adopted. The original joint resolution provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should continue to administer the law as it has been administered in the past by men holding that high and exalted position, but the committee in their wisdom, or unwisdom, as I think, have added the following proviso to the joint resolution:

That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them: And provided further, That he shall not be required to expend all the appropriation available for said purchase, but only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects named in said act.

The first part of the proviso is of little consequence and it ought not to be in a joint resolution or a bill passed by the honorable Senate of the United States. It simply provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall honestly expend the money. That is what we expect the Secretary of Agriculture to do, and I have heard no suggestion from any Senator that any Secretary of Agriculture has misappropriated funds which have been placed in his hands for this very laudable purpose.

The second proviso is of more consequence, inasmuch as it gives to the Secretary the discretion to use all of this money, one-half of this money, one-fourth of this money, or one dollar of it, and not any more than one dollar of it, in any given year for this purpose. I do not think we want to legislate in that way. Let us do one of two things. Let us either say to the Secretary of Agriculture that it is the judgment of the Senate of the United States that he shall execute the law, or let us repeal the law and get rid of the matter entirely. I shall vote to reject the amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and then if, by the aid of my associates, I accomplish that result I shall vote for the joint resolution, believing it to be an act of simple justice to a large class of people whom we are bound to protect, so far as we can, in all matters of legislation.

The farmers of this country, Mr. President, are very heavily taxed. Every dollar's worth of property they have is visible. The taxgatherer finds it, and they are compelled to pay taxes upon it. But when we come to the cities, a very large proportion of the property held by the rich man and the moderately rich man of the country is hidden from the taxgatherer, and they pay no taxes whatever upon it. While the rich man thus escapes, the man who is laboring for his daily bread, the farmer who is struggling, under adverse conditions, to earn a living from the soil, has to pay taxes upon every dollar's worth of property he has in the world.

In view of these considerations, so hurriedly and crudely expressed, I wish to be considered as a Senator who in a matter of this kind deems it his right and his duty to do what he can to give relief, even though it be in a very small way, to the farmers of this great country, and that, too, without stopping to split legal hairs or to indulge in ponderous discussion of the constitutionality of an act which has never heretofore been questioned. Let this resolution be passed, and then we will see whether the Secretary of Agriculture will dare take the responsibility to further ignore or refuse to carry out the plainly expressed wishes of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to renew my faith in the great capacity and the great integrity of the Secretary of Agriculture, as expressed in this Chamber a few days ago. It does not follow necessarily that because I may differ from the Secretary of Agriculture I am willing to hear anything against him, he being a citizen of my State, which will either impugn his motives or involve his character. I shall vote for the joint resolution at the proper time because I believe it to be right legally, and because I believe it to be in the line of proper policy.

I desire briefly to answer some of the arguments of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. It may look like presumption for a young man like me to differ with so venerable a jurist as the Senator from Mississippi, and yet it occurs to me that the questions of law involved are so simple that there can scarcely be any question as to the construction to be placed upon the statute referred to by him.

The Senator read from section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which is in this language:

The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

The Senator from Mississippi asked whether any Senator can point out any seeds which are rare and uncommon to the country that the Secretary of Agriculture has not purchased. I do not myself profess to know what the Secretary of Agriculture has done in this line. I have not been in communication with him on the subject, nor do I suppose that it is claimed or can be claimed by any lawyer that unless the seeds are rare and uncommon, such, perhaps, as are not indigenous to this country, the Secretary of Agriculture would be expected or could be required to carry out the first provision of the act.

Now, what is his duty with reference to the second provision, couched in this language:

Or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another.

If there are any seeds or plants which can be made more profitable by being transferred from one section of the country to another and cultivated, cultivated with profit, perhaps, then no man would doubt that it is the duty, the plain, the bounden duty, of the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of the act and purchase and distribute those seeds.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi says it would be necessary under those circumstances, by way of illustration, to take a seed grown in Florida and send it to Maine, then return it and ship it again until it is demonstrated in the language of the statute that it "can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another." I do not concur in the view of the Senator from Mississippi in this respect. The very policy of this statute is that seeds grown in one section of the country shall be transferred to another section of the country and there experimented with, and if after proper experiment it is demonstrated that they can be grown profitably there, the spirit and the letter of the law are both complied with by their distribution.

Now, I did suggest to the Senator when on his feet the thought that this statute invested the sole power in the Secretary of Agriculture to determine whether the seeds were such as "can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another"; and if that were the only statute on the subject and the Secretary of Agriculture had exercised his discretion, I would, as a mere matter of law, be compelled to vote against the joint resolution and sustain him. There can not be the slightest doubt that where a statute vests a discretion in a public officer, or in an individual, for that matter, if that discretion is honestly executed it is not within the power of a court or of a coordinate department to control it. Even though the Secretary of Agriculture were an ordinary officer or agent and the honorable Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] should apply for a writ of mandamus to compel him to execute the law, there is no judge upon the face of the earth, in my judgment, who understands the construction of a statute who would grant a writ of mandamus under those circumstances, for by the language of the statute itself and from its very purpose and policy he is invested with the sole power to determine whether or not the seeds "can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another."

But I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Mississippi to a question which he overlooked in his discussion. Statutes that are pari materia must be construed together. You can not take this section of the Revised Statutes and construe it one way and then take some other statute bearing upon the same subject and give it some other construction. All the statutes bearing upon the purchase and distribution of seeds must be construed together. In other words, from this legislation the plain purpose of the legislature must be deduced.

If this were the only statute upon the subject, I would reach precisely the same conclusion that has been reached by the honorable Senator form Mississippi, but it is not. The Senator from Mississippi entirely destroyed his argument upon this proposition when he referred to the appropriation act of 1895, quoting from page 733, volume 28, United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-third Congress. I read:

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of labor, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $180,000.

Then the section goes on and provides how the distribution is to be made. I have no doubt in my own mind that the part of the statute which I have just read and a portion of it which I have not read take from the Secretary of Agriculture entirely the question of discretion; that is, it robs the Secretary of Agriculture of the discretion invested in him by section 527. Clearly it is within the power of Congress to take that discretion from him. Congress gave him the power by section 527 of the Revised Statutes, and Congress can take the power from him. Congress determined by the passage of the appropriation bill in 1895 that the law imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture the duty to distribute seeds under section 527, and when Congress took that power from him it was his duty to execute the provisions of the appropriation act.

The Senator from Mississippi lays down another singular proposition of law. It may be entirely sound; I will not say that it is not, but certainly it sounds strange to me. He says that we have no power to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to execute the law as it now exists. We have power to direct every officer of this Government to execute the law if he fails to do so. We may not have the power to compel him to execute the law, but we have power and ample right to direct him to execute it. The Secretary of Agriculture is at the head of one of the important branches of the executive department of the Government. His very office was created by statute. It is not a constitutional office. It was erected and built up by statute passed within the last ten years, perhaps within the last seven years. Can we not direct the execution of the law by an officer whose office we create? It would be a singular Government, possessing three coordinate departments, as we sometimes speak of it, but as a matter of fact we have but one department, that of the judiciary, if Congress, invested by the Constitution with plenary power over legislation, having created an office and advised and consented to the appointment of the officer filling it, can not direct the officer occupying that position in the discharge of his duty. With all due respect for my honorable friend, the Senator from Mississippi, I deny that there is any rule for the construction of a statute recognized in this country which prohibits us in the slightest degree from directing him in the discharge of his duty.

Mark you, Mr. President, I do not doubt the disposition of the Secretary of Agriculture to discharge his duty when the statute is plain to him. If the statutes are ambiguous, as it seems to be the ambition of Congress sometimes to make them, clearly it is within our power to pass a statute that is not ambiguous directing him to discharge his duty under the appropriation act of 1895. But upon what does the Senator from Mississippi base his objection to this conclusion? Upon the ground that the power to see that the laws are enforced and executed rests with the Chief Executive. The negative implication from the position of the Senator from Mississippi would be that every officer of the Government of the United States has it within his power to ignore statutes and to ignore the fundamental law, simply because the Constitution, out of an abundance of caution, charges the Chief Executive with the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed.

The Chief Executive being at the head of the executive department of the Government was required by the Constitutional Convention that framed our Constitution to watch over his subordinate officers and to see that they execute their duties which were plainly and legibly written in the statutes of the United States. Would any Senator claim that, because the Constitution, out of an abundance of caution, has charged this duty upon the Chief Executive, therefore the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of Agriculture, or the head of any other Department or any subordinate officer could ignore the statutes of the United States and could not be controlled by Congress in their execution?

The position of the Senator from Mississippi is unsound. It is unsound because Congress, in the first place, has taken from the Secretary of Agriculture the discretion invested in him by section 527 of the Revised Statutes and has assumed that power itself. When, by the appropriation act of 1895, Congress directed the Secretary of Agriculture to expend the sum of money appropriated by that act for the purchase of seeds, it was, in my judgment, his bounden duty to carry out the provisions of the act without questioning it in the slightest degree.

Mr. President, just a moment upon the question of the policy of this law. If the Secretary of Agriculture does not agree with the policy of the act, it furnishes no reason why he should not observe it. I believe in the policy of the act of distributing seeds. It is the only thing that makes many a citizen of this country feel that he is akin to his Government. The little package of seeds sent 3,000 miles across the continent to some humble citizen in the State of California makes him believe that his great Government at Washington is mindful of him, that it knows and recognizes him. It is a mere pittance to the farmers and the gardeners of this country. A great Government with money to throw away upon corporations by the millions and hundreds of millions ought not to complain or protest against the execution of this law. It was enacted for a wise and beneficent purpose, and I believe it ought to be executed in the fullness of its spirit, that it ought to be maintained. By these means great good can be done to the farmers and producers of the country, while the character of the seeds that are distributed from one end of the country to another are developed to the benefit of our people.

Mr. PALMER obtained the floor.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. On behalf of the committee, I wish to move an amendment to the joint resolution and at the same time to modify the amendment reported by the committee. This may somewhat simplify the discussion. In lines 4, 5, 6, and 7 I move to strike out the words:

Directed to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds;

And insert:

Authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years;

So as to read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years.

Then I wish to modify the amendment of the committee by striking out, in line 14, after "objects," the words "named in said act" and inserting "of this joint resolution"; so as to read:

But only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects of this joint resolution.

I shall also move to further amend the joint resolution by striking out, in lines 14 and 15, the words "and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins."

There was a misprint, I will state, in the joint resolution as reprinted. The amendment of the committee, beginning in line 7, after the words "valuable seeds," should have followed at the end of the joint resolution. I move, in behalf of the committee, the amendments I have stated.

While I am on my feet, although I do not wish to take up any time in this discussion, I will state that it seems to me this is a very simple matter indeed. Section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which has been referred to, specifies what seeds may be purchased. The Attorney-General in his opinion, which is entirely correct, as the real point was not involved in the question submitted to him, decided that the purchase must be made in accordance with that act. That, of course, we all admit. But Congress has interpreted the act year after year by making the appropriation for the purchase of seeds. The seeds have been purchased and distributed. We have taken them and sent them to our constituents, and if the law has been violated in the purchase certainly we have been participants in the violation.

I think the motives of the Secretary of Agriculture in the action he has taken were good. He saw, as we all see, that there had been abuses under this statute, but I think he made a mistake in the method of correcting them. Instead of failing to carry out the evident purpose of Congress, I think proper representation should have been made to the Committee on Appropriations, and then either the appropriation should have been withheld or the abuse corrected by some provision of law.

Under the amendments now proposed I think there can be no objection to the joint resolution. The Secretary is prevented from paying an unfair price for any of the seeds, and if on account of the lateness of the season the appropriation can not be properly expended he has a discretion in the matter. I have no fear that he will use that discretion improperly. He will plainly see from the discussion and the action upon the joint resolution, if adopted, that the purpose of Congress is that the appropriation shall be carried out in its spirit. I have no doubt he will comply with it. I hope the amendments will be adopted. I believe the pending question is upon the adoption of the amendments, and then I trust that the joint resolution will be passed.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have the highest respect for the Secretary of Agriculture, not only for his views with regard to economy, but upon many other subjects. After listening to the very careful and lawyer-like analysis of the pending joint resolution by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I doubt whether we have any mandatory authority or that our mere request or order or direction to him to obey the law would have any binding force. I am not quite sure that the joint resolution will have any effect whatever.

In differing as I do from the Secretary of Agriculture as to the policy of his interpretation of the law, I think proper to protect myself in whatever I may hereafter do by expressing a most emphatic and distinct dissent from his practical interpretation of the statute. I think I know better in regard to the operation of the law than the Secretary of Agriculture does or can know. I think my acquaintance is much more extensive with the people I represent than his acquaintance possibly can be with the people of the United States. I know that in the distribution of seeds immense good has been accomplished. I do not deny, indeed I frankly admit, that many of the seeds distributed by me were valueless. I know, too, that many of the seeds reached hands that did not appreciate them. But I think I can speak on this subject with more confidence than most Senators from my intimate acquaintance with the people of central Illinois, where I have lived for fifty years. I know the suggestive value of the distribution of seeds, and that it has been productive of immense good.

As I said, I have lived in the central part of Illinois for fifty years. I am therefore extensively acquainted with the people, with men of all ages. In the distribution of these seeds I had but two objects in view. One was to furnish them to intelligent and experienced horticulturists and agriculturists, who would be most likely to demonstrate their value, if they had value; but I sent them to a large number of young men just beginning life, and, as I said, their suggestive value in hundreds of instances has been exceedingly great, indeed. I know that in very many instances young men, and young women, too, for that matter, to whom I sent a class of seeds that were appropriate to their sex and employment, who had no taste or had no opportunity to indulge or cultivate their tastes for horticulture and agriculture, have been bettered and improved by the seeds furnished them. Some of them, I know, were merely the plants and grains and grasses with which we are familiar, but there were many new seeds, of plant and grasses and cereals, that went into the hands of young men and incited in them a spirit of inquiry and anxiety for improvement that has done immense good.

I think, therefore, the Secretary of Agriculture has underrated the importance of seed distribution. The educational value is much greater, as I believe, than in any other respect, and they have made agriculturists and horticulturists; they have stimulated the taste and fancy of that class of persons, and some have manifested an extreme anxiety not only in procuring seeds from the seed stores, but have expressed great anxiety in regard to the seeds distributed by members of Congress.

I may say further that under the analysis of this joint resolution by the Senator from Mississippi, I am not sure that it ought to be passed by the Senate, but that I might place myself in the emphatic position of disagreeing with the Secretary of Agriculture in his interpretation of the law and the effect of his decision, I felt bound to make these remarks.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the joint resolution may go over. It is now nearly 2 o'clock. I desire to address the Senate upon it, and I dislike to commence and then be taken off the floor by the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PEFFER. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that the pending joint resolution may go over without losing its place.

Mr. PEFFER. Without prejudice?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. 189) to repeal an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; and

A bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, as it is within a few minutes of the time when it would be laid before the Senate as the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the observations I was endeavoring to make yesterday evening I was investigating the proposition whether the power of government alone could prescribe the money functions. If that be true, and it is demonstrably true, many important consequences result from it. The question of the parity of the metals is at once disposed of, because it is obvious that the power that creates parity makes it a subject of law. If it declares that gold and silver shall be equal in fixed proportions for the discharge of government obligations and private debts, for that purpose its parity is absolutely certain and can not be destroyed by any possible contingency. For the purpose for which the law creates the equality the equality must remain, irrespective of whether one or the other metal is of any value except that which is given to it by the law.

Now, the question to consider in reason is, What are the uses which Government can prescribe for money? What is its great power which is within the control of Government? The exactions of Government are equal to all the property of the country, to all the services of the country. It demands the life of its citizens or its subjects. It imposes taxes without limit. From time to time great public enterprises are conceived and entered upon. For these purposes exactions are made. It may prescribe that which will discharge the debts of every man, and that is what we call legal tender. These debts are infinite in variety and immeasurable. With what reason, then, do we enter into these protracted discussions as to the value of that thing to which this function is attached when without the office or function of paying public and private debts it is of little or no value? Manifestly that kind of reasoning should have no place in the argument.

The power of government is that of sacrificing life and property, of demanding services. What, then, is the force of this argument as to the natural value, one or the other, of the things to which the money function may be imparted? As I observed yesterday, in the days of the Roman Empire the creditor had the right upon the nonpayment of his debt to make a slave of the debtor and of his family. To what extent would these sacrifices of property and of labor or service be made by a man to preserve the liberty of himself and his family? So, the law now says you shall pay your debts, pay your taxes, in gold or in silver or Treasury notes. Is not that which the law prescribes as the compulsory use that which will determine its absolute competency for that purpose, and the absolute and indestructible parity or equality of each of the things required to be used?

Mr. President, these are the considerations upon which we must enter for the determination of this question. Suppose we look further and ask why it is that one thing, or two things, or three things should be made the money of a country. This is a tribunal where we ought to consider this subject and determine it in the light of reason and experience. Why shall there be one thing only which has the money function attached to it? In the answer to that question depends the reasonable determination of this whole subject. It is because in all periods of time, the Government's power being unlimited in the interests of the great mass of the people, it was necessary that some privilege should be afforded the debtor in the choice of that which would enable him to discharge his debts.

It was and it is the duty of Government to protect that to which it imparted the power and confined the power of satisfying public and private obligations. It was and is the duty of those who hold power over the people to see that there could be no monopoly, no confinement of the control of the money function to a few, for that would create a privileged class that destroy free government; that would build up imperial power and create an aristocracy.

The control of this function of representing and transferring values, of making something a legal tender for public and private obligations by individuals, by corporations, or banks is to give them power over government, whether it be an autocratic or a democratic government. It creates inevitably a privileged class, and sooner or later an enfeebled and degenerate aristocracy resting on industrial slavery and military power.

Hence we find that in all the reasoning upon this subject this power of the Government to create the money function and attach to it that which was most convenient in its natural qualities has been recognized and has been used. The fact that gold and silver metals are the most convenient in their qualities for that use is an entirely different consideration from the money function itself, the power which may be so exercised as to give to some one thing which is in the possession of a few the right to put their hand into every man's pocket and into every household and take from them their legitimate earnings and the profits of their own domestic and personal economy.

Let us see if this be not true. This idea, which in this discussion has had so small a part, dominates in the reason of a great part of the intelligent and capable men who have administered governments and are administering them now, and is a theory and an opinion powerful in the economies of our day. If we will look into this subject we will find that to-day in the colossal money power of England, with its five thousand millions of dollars of money and credits which usurp or take the place of money in the London and branch banks, the power of Government, the credit of the Government of Great Britain is at the foundation of every note of the Bank of England; that the debt which the Government owes to the Bank of England, created as a matter of public policy, is the chief security of every pound of the notes of the Bank of England.

I have here a book from which I will read some extracts in relation to the former conditions of law and power in prescribing the money functions by the different governments of the world. A recent article headed "Horace White's money and banking" in the February number of Gunton's Magazine, in commenting on the recent works on money issued, by Mr. Horace White, the editor of the Evening Post, and Mr. Alexander Delmar, who in 1865 was appointed Director of the Bureau of Statistics by Secretary Chase, says:

> Thus it may be said that Mr. Delmar, writing up the history, through thirty centuries of "gold" itself, comes to the conclusion that what is blindly taken to be its commodity value has at all times sprung mainly through its coinage use; this, in turn, has been dominated by a subtle connection anciently with imperial and sacerdotal "flatism," and at present with commercial monopoly and financial centralization of power. Mr. Delmar sees in the Rothschilds and the Bank of England the lineal successors to the Cæsars, Tamerlanes, and Ghengis Khans. Mr. White, on the other hand, writing the history of a country and period in which "flatism" has been the almost exclusive rule, and gold the exception, has embraced the conviction that gold is the Ark of the Covenant, the sacred dwelling of "the Host," and that "flatism" is a heresy to be smitten hip and thigh, like the Hivites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites, who hinder the progress of the Lord's anointed into the promised land.
> Mr. Delmar expresses his faith thus (page 307): "And let it be remarked that I am not here advocating a policy, but chronicling a historical fact; all the great enfranchisements of societies have been accomplished with the aid of fiduciary money. The Spartans won their liberty with iron disks of Lycurgus; the Athenians, before the Alexandrian period, rehabilitated the republic with 'nomisma,' a highly overvalued copper issue; the Romans overthrew their kings with the aid of overvalued 'nummi,' whose emissions were controlled and regulated by the State, ex senatus consulto.
> "The earliest republic in Europe which had the courage to defy the moribund hierarchy of Cæsar was that of Novgorod, whose money was impressed upon leather and doubtless issued by the State; the money of the Scandinavian revolution was the 'klippings' of Gustavus Vasa, which were issued by the State; the money by the aid of which Gustavus Adolphus saved the Protestant religion from being stamped out by Ferdinand, the Catholic, was overvalued copper 'rundstyks' issued by the State; the money of the Dutch revolution was the pasteboard 'dollars' issued by the city of Leyden; of the American Revolution, the paper notes issued by the colonial governments; of the French revolution, the 'assignats' and 'mandats' issued by the National Assembly; and of the antislavery war in the United States, 'greenbacks.'
> All these moneys were issued and the emissions were controlled by the State. They were not individual notes nor private bank notes, but essentially State notes.

So to-day we have in our country nearly $3,000,000,000 of different kinds of credits, with only some $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 of actual money, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury, in the national banks of this country. There is $5,000,000,000 in England of credit money resting largely upon the credit of the Government, and $4,000,000,000 in our country of different forms of credit resting upon credit of the Government of the United States in the shape of its bonds.

Mr. President, no proposition can be more clear than that the money function is created by the Government in this, that that which it prescribes as the necessary thing for the payment of Government exactions and private debts is money and is in demand by every man and every subject of its power. The law says to him, "You shall pay the Government exactions." Upon what penalty? Upon the penalty of confiscation and sale of your property. The law says to him, "You shall pay your debts; you shall pay them in gold or in silver at certain proportions."

What is it that can change this prescription of the law? You may say that if the law unwisely prescribes something which is of no value, that it is a confiscation of the debt. So it is, and it would be unwise to do so. So, also, you may say that if the law prescribes that which is in the power or is easily accumulated in the possession and control of a few persons, it is an unwise exercise of power, and so it is. But this question derives its importance to-day from the proposition not of what would be an unwise exercise of the power of attaching the office or function of money to something unfavorable to the creditor class or the privileged class, but from its connection with the economies which threaten the destruction of our Government and the ruin of our people. How is this question of money, of the exercise of the power to attach the money function to paper or to gold or to silver, or to all three, connected with these economies?

Instances are not wanting in which the exercise of the taxing power in the past ages has produced, in connection with other economies, a condition of absolute ruin amongst the people, in which it has created revolution.

The terrible revolution in France was produced by economies which created a power of taxation in the hands of private individuals. The celebrated statesman, Vauban, of France, writing of the condition of things at his time, in the seventeenth century, preceding the French Revolution by not a great period, said:

> The populations are impoverished by the excess of taxes, to the privation of the nutriments necessary to sustain life. Numbers, thrown into despair, desert their country or perish from want. These evils exist at the time I write this, and are even constantly increasing. They are much greater than is usually supposed, and may lead to most disastrous consequences for the body politic. They are of a gangrenous nature, and corrupt by degrees all the parts of the body till they reach the heart. This comparison ought to be well considered. It gives room to deep reflection.
> The highways and byways are filled with beggars driven from home by hunger and the loss of all they possess. They are the tenth part of the population, and it is out of the power of half of the rest to give them alms, because it is reduced to nearly the same condition.

He says this condition is greatly aggravated by the power of taxation given under different franchises to private individuals.

Suppose we consider that question ourselves. We have a vast army of unemployed. I have here before me a book which is entitled The Coming Revolution—the coming revolution because of the poverty of the great mass of the people, because of the great army of unemployed, because of the power of taxation in innumerable franchises levied upon the people, because of the exactions of corporate power.

I have some statistics upon that subject relating to my own State. I am not an extremist. I am not here to disparage the proper use and influence of corporate power nor to attack with vehement declamation those who may entertain different opinions, nor to decry the large accumulation of wealth, but I am here to say that, notwithstanding the profound indifference upon this subject, this question of money derives its importance from the power of taxation granted to individuals in the different franchises which our modern system of economy has created. I am here to say that the evidence presents itself conclusively and demands the consideration of this body in every possible form of investigation. The evidence is conclusive of the fact that the great mass of our people are being ground into absolute poverty and want by unnecessary, unreasonable exactions imposed by the different corporate franchises, State and Federal, which have been granted.

Now, let us suppose that there is a community in which the charters of incorporation have been granted franchises upon heat, and light, and transportation, and locomotion, corporations, syndicates, and trusts for the control of every article of necessity, of consumption, and of production. Let us suppose that in that community the money function is prescribed by the State to that which is alone possessed by the owners of these franchises, what is the condition of the country? How will they exercise this great power? Can they be relied upon, with the avarice and desire for accumulation which is common to all of us, to exercise it of their own volition so lightly as to promote the common happiness and the comfort and the prosperity of the great mass and body of the people? Is it to be without restraint, and are not we the responsible parties who, either from fear or some other reason, fail to adopt proper measures for the restraint and the proper exercise of this corporate power? And is it not the owners of these franchises who now demand gold money, so that they may monopolize it?

It is not a question of party; it is not a question of political division; but it is one which should address itself to all representatives. Is it true—and, if not true, let the fact be demonstrated—that in this great country of ours the hand of power, created by legislative franchises, is impoverishing every man and family? Transportation is far above its proper and necessary cost. Fortunes are accumulated, as a French statistician has recently said, and he has called the attention of the people of the world to the advantages of despotic government, of arbitrary government, over republican government, by citing the control of power over these franchises in the absolute and monarchical countries of the world. In that article he states from the census of the United States that fortunes such as the world has never seen, and in comparison with which that of the nobility of Europe pale, are accumulated in the hands of individuals in our country through the power of taxation granted in legislative franchises. He avers from our census that 70 people in this country own $3,000,000,000 of property in taxable values, created by law-imposing taxation two, three, four, and five times for the same transportation above the cost in Europe, and above its reasonable and proper cost, and yet in our Government here we have no attention or notice paid to it.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] spoke the other day of the advantages of these economies. Surely so, but what of the advantage of exercising their power ruthlessly and to the destruction of the people? What of imposing charges upon fictitious capitalization three, four, and five times above its necessary and reasonable cost? What of the public policy, which should demand the attention of every statesman, to reduce the cost to labor and to the people of these extravagant and arbitrary charges? What of the failure even to examine in behalf of the people the question, or to see whether or not the nobility, the untitled nobility, who exercise and own this power, have accumulated these vast fortunes of one, two, and three hundred millions of dollars by virtue of the power to tax the people alone? How of that statesmanship which fails even to investigate this subject and ascertain whether it be true or not?

Mr. President, if this be true, this monopoly of money, caused by the confinement of the function of legal tender to one metal, to gold alone, is intensified a thousand times by this requirement. It is the same as if by legislation the law gave to these few men by name—they who own all the banks, they who own all the railroads in connection with their European associates, and they who own as private property a power of taxation coextensive with the entire production and consumption of the country, resting upon every act of transportation of either person or property—it is the same as if by law and by name this great power of taxation had been conferred upon them. No inquiry, no investigation, no attempt to control this power exerted by the men in whom the people have confided their safety and their protection.

So this question can not be confused by attributing some magical properties to gold or silver, or by refusing that option which has existed always to the debtor for his protection, to the end that monopoly, or the power of taxation or exaction, shall not in the hands of a few persons gather into their possession that which alone will discharge the public tax and the private debt, and that the law shall not with one hand compel payment out of the labor of the poor man and out of the labor of every man, and with the other reduce the value and price of his labor, as compared with the thing which is required to pay it, and which is in the possession of a few persons only.

These propositions result demonstrably and logically by an inevitable conclusion from the fact, if true, that the function of money, and the things to which it is attached, are separable and distinct in reason, and that the power of attaching the function of money or legal tender is in government, and in government alone.

This fact is recognized in our Constitution, which says that no State shall "make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts"—debts public and private. So in all ages and in all times, in the days of the Roman Empire, when provinces were conquered and tribute levied without limit and without reason, it had to be paid in that which the government prescribed. Julius Cæsar prescribed gold or silver in the proportions of one part to eleven, and for two thousand years this option, this alternative power has existed, not because of any value of the metals as commodities, for that has nothing to do with it. The power of government might have prescribed that it should be copper or iron, as has been done sometimes.

It is true that copper and iron would not answer the purposes of exchange and commerce so well; but so far as power was concerned, so far as paying private debts was concerned, so far as paying public obligations was concerned, the copper or the iron, if demanded by the power of government, would have answered that purpose, and so within the terms, the prescription of law, no matter what silver or gold may be worth, for the purpose of paying debts, public and private, the obligation of the law makes the parity absolute. No human power can disturb it so long as the law prescribes it.

But it is said that there is such a thing as difference in exchange, that there is use in one country for a particular kind of coin and in another for the bullion value of the metal; that one country will prohibit the use or not endow anything with the use of the money function except one thing, and that, therefore, there will be a demand. Admit that to be true, of what avail in the argument is that, except that wherever there is a demand for one thing made greater than another it will go there, if there be convenience of transportation and accessibility? Of what importance is that fact to the great mass of transactions, to the debtor class of the country, who are ever its support, who fight its battles, who furnish its brains? It is not the rich, it is not the owners of our great franchises, who sustain the Government; it is the brain of the poor men and poor women and their children who grow up to defend the country in war, to become its great scholars, its great judges, its great ministers and lawyers.

So, under every government, be it autocratic or democratic, a wise ruler provides for the elevation of the masses, the comfort of the homes, the better support of the toilers of the world; and he is a poor governor or a poor emperor or a poor representative of the people in Congress or in a republican government who does not look closely to these considerations as the determining point of public policies.

Mr. President, we have this question before us. We have the question of determining whether or not the mints of this country shall be opened to the free coinage of silver and to its use as a money function upon equal terms and fixed proportions with gold. I have endeavored to show that the scarcity or the abundance of these metals has no part or figure in this discussion in the real argument of the subject; I have endeavored to show that parity is not a matter of consideration. It is true that if silver or gold were as abundant as the air or the water or the earth that unlimited quantity would affect the argument and make it unwise to provide that the debts and obligations of the people should be paid in that which was common and universal, and to which there was no limitation. But is there any reason in the proposition that there is no limitation to the coinage? Can it not be suspended in an hour? Can we not anticipate the future, finding money becoming a drug? Is it so now? And is it not true that it is too scarce and difficult to be obtained?

In every part of this country, away from the great centers, money can be had upon no terms except those of absolute confiscation. In the State which I represent in part, in the late calamity, when the severe cold destroyed $20,000,000 worth of property in a single night and left men, women, and children to the necessity of cultivating the ground without knowledge of the subject, money could not be had to rehabilitate their farms, to assist them in regaining a comfortable subsistence. Children are withheld from school, the sick are provided with insufficient attentions, and want exists in many households. Why? Because there is no distribution of the money which is in the country, because it is gathered in the great cities; because the great monopolies of transportation day by day gather all the money in the country and send it, as fast as the railway trains can speed it, to the great centers of commerce, leaving the people entirely without the means of exchanging products or borrowing to supply the necessities of life. This is the condition of our country.

The wise statesman, in my judgment, whether he be of one party or the other, upon this side of the Chamber or the other, will look into these conditions and to the connection of the exercise of the power of prescribing a money function with special reference to whether or not we have a concentrated money power, resting upon franchises created by law, imposing taxes without limitation, without the consent or the representation of the people, into whose hands, unless we guard it carefully, the money function will be committed entirely.

It is not to the interest of those who wish the preservation of property, it is not to the interest of those who, like myself, discourage extreme ideas or fanatical opinions or anarchical ideas, it is not for the interests of property, it is not for the interests of this Republic or republican government or of any political party, that we should shut our eyes to that condition of public economy which, by franchises created by law, produces fortunes of three or four hundred million dollars in single individuals and poverty in the mass of the people, a condition of things which, according to the statements of the book before me, and largely supported by statements in the public press, gives to 30,000 people more than half of all the products of the labor of 70,000,000 of the American people.

Is that true, or is it not? Let us investigate it; let us ascertain if the fact be so, and if it be not true, in vindication of the owners of these franchises let the fact be demonstrated to the people of the country. If it be true that these franchises are every day gathering the entire money of the country and carrying it to these great centers; if it be true that the 70 men own this $3,000,000,000 by virtue of laws which we have either created or permitted to exist, let us enact some legislation which will prevent it; let us see above all things that the power of prescribing a money function shall not be exercised by this Government and this Congress to attach it to anything which is peculiarly susceptible of control by combinations and trusts.

That, Mr. President, is the great danger. As I have said, in my own State the people believe that these powers are exercised to their ruin, to their impoverishment. They know that they have no money; they know that they have to pay extraordinary rates of interest; they know that no money is to be had except by a supply from the great cities of the country.

As a matter of sound economy and statesmanship, ought there to be public policies which concentrate the entire money of the country in the possession of a few persons, which impose heavy burdens upon production and transportation? Are these wise economies? In my judgment they are not. We should call a halt. The policy advocated in the great financial centers of the country by so many men of large ability connected with great enterprises is absolutely destructive of themselves, of their order, and dangerous to the just accumulation of property.

The Bank of England has $5,000,000,000 of capital in connection with branch banks. That great capital rests upon the indebtedness of the Government of Great Britain to the Bank of England. We are told that it means a solidarity of money, a mobilization of capital. We are told that in the United States the banks concentrate and hold $4,000,000,000 of credits and assets of different descriptions, with cash or money in possession of only $700,000,000 of the $1,600,000,000 stated to be in the country, and that their business exceeds the total money of the country by the difference between $1,600,000,000 and three or four thousand million dollars of transactions.

We perceive, then, that in the Bank of England and in the banks of our country nearly the entire money of the world at this date is represented and controlled; we perceive that these banks are owned by a few hundred men at home and abroad, and that the men who own the great systems of transportation, the great lines of steamships, the great combinations of capital which control great enterprises, are the men who own all the money of the world, and in connection with it in our own country, the richest of all—exceeding the wealth of Great Britain by more than $2,000,000,000, and according to the estimates of the French statistician to whom I have referred—we have 70 of the richest people that the sun has ever shone upon; rich not in the competition of legitimate trade, rich not in commercial enterprises, rich not by virtue of their superiority of brain to the poor people of the country, but rich by a power of law creating public franchises, and which we fear to expose and to restrain.

Mr. President, shall we add to that power, the power to own and prescribe the things which shall control the legal tender, the money which shall perform the function of representing and transferring values, and shall we argue from day to day as to the effects of natural law upon the original bullion value of this or that metal, and disguise and cover up under these vain and fictitious ideas the fact that this is a question alone as to whether the Government shall create a great privileged class, a class having power, if without titles of nobility, having that which is far more powerful, the power to appropriate the labor of the people without their consent, the power to make times hard and make money scarce and services of little purchasing power, to prevent all enterprises which they do not own and control, and to create a great army of unemployed people, vainly striving to obtain work?

Mr. President, I do not share in the condemnation of those who differ in opinion from me. I acknowledge that the reverse of these opinions are entertained by men of great ability, and, as I believe, of patriotism. I do not share in the severe criticisms which have been passed upon the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury for want of personal fidelity and patriotism. With a record of seventeen years' service, in which I have never given a vote for a bond, in which I have never given a vote in favor of the extension of corporate franchises, in which I have voted ever for their restraint and for their complete and absolute control by the representatives of the people—with these opinions, and with such a record, I am not afraid to do justice to those who differ in opinion with me, and to say that there are honest differences of opinion.

But in my judgment there is but one real side. That side is that money shall be abundant, whether it be paper money which the Government prescribes shall be equal to silver and gold for the payment of public dues; whether it be gold in 1 part to 16 parts of silver, according to tradition, which, next to law, is powerful, or whether it be some new and entirely different system. It must be abundant and within the reach of the people, and we know of no other method than that which for thousands of years has been the only method—the free coinage of gold and silver in a fixed proportion. If you take up the arguments one by one which endeavor to meet this proposition, you find them utterly untenable. Yet in some of these examinations there is some degree of force to be attached to this question. In Gunton's Magazine, which I have been reading and of which I spoke awhile ago, there are some considerations which are worthy of attention. They are as follows:

Writing of Mr. White's book on money, the writer says:

> In confining it [money] to the function of swapping one piece of goods for another by measuring the value of the effort expended on each, he avoids much subtlety and appears to have attained to special simplicity of treatment. This is necessarily at the cost of overlooking and underestimating the dynamic power of monetary facts and events upon the intellectual progress and social development. Hence Mr. White never presents to us money in its tides and currents as a comprehensive whole. He generally contradicts or denies the existence of all that class of phenomena which Hume, Adam Smith, Hamilton, Carey, Alison, and others have dwelt upon as arising out of its volume or scarcity, its abundance or lack. He takes no note of the effect of a credit currency of a higher or more satisfactory kind, like the greenback note in 1862, to retire a credit currency previously in vogue of book accounts and commercial time paper, thus stimulating production by substituting cash payments for slow trusts of private solvency.

It seems, then, that here is another idea, and a very correct idea, that there is a dynamic force pervading society everywhere, resulting from the monetary condition of a country. It is true, and if that dynamic force be concentrated in the hands of the Bank of England and a few bankers in our country to control our national system, and if it be powerful enough to suppress inquiry, to discourage and daunt public men, if it be powerful enough to control the elections of States and place this Government and all its powers in the hands of seventy men with three thousand millions of property, it means, Mr. President, great ruin, great civil disorder, and great danger to republican institutions.

I insist that these are not questions of party division. I insist that they appeal to every statesman for at least calm inquiry and discussion. The idea that we hear discussed in this Chamber is that prices are dependent upon the scarcity of gold or the abundance of silver. Prices are dependent upon the depressive and repressive power of monopoly—monopoly of money, monopoly of transportation, upon privilege over right, which oppresses the great mass of producers, which creates trusts, combinations, syndicates, corporations controlling every article of production, every article of consumption. To attempt to arrive at a solution of this question without considering the cost of rents, without considering the cost of all the thousands of the minutiæ of life, is an argument destitute of the elements of reason, and, in my judgment, it does not require consideration, except that consideration which will point out the prices of labor, the prices of human services, which constitute the great mass of the wealth of the country.

The rent of land, the rent of houses, the taxation imposed through the different franchises, the increased cost of living, or the decreased cost of living—these thousands of particulars created, as was said by Vauban in the time of France, by the power given to privileged classes to impose taxes outside of the requirements of the State, are the things to be looked into, one by one, before we can arrive at any just conclusion. Are the markets the property of individuals? Are the highways the property of private individuals? Are houses and lands within the control of a few? Are the public policies such as to prevent the toiler from owning his own household? Are the economies of insurance, of protection to life, such that they are prescribed by a limited class of people?

Look at our condition here in the city of Washington. Look at the corporations here. See what amount they contribute to the general fund of the people. See the enormous tax upon light. Who pays it? Who pays the capitalization and the watered stock? It is the poor man, the poor woman, the child with limited education. Would we preserve those franchises? Then let us see that the cost they impose upon the people is reduced to the lowest degree. Let us make money abundant. Let us forbid that it shall be a monopoly; and how else can we do that except in this first step by making silver the equal of gold in fixed proportions prescribed by law and in supplementing it, when monopolies shall perchance hoard both, with the power of the Government to issue its credit notes, without interest or with interest, as may be necessary, to supply, in temporary exigencies, that which the combinations destroy by hoarding the money.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that the troubles of the Treasury are imaginary; that the Government has but to exercise an option—the option of paying in gold or silver or Treasury notes—that we have but to provide that the public debt shall be paid in either, at the discretion of the Treasury. Then there will be and can be demonstrably no depreciation of our credit, our bonds, or our securities. All Europe would be glad to-day to exchange every dollar of their public credit for the noninterest-bearing obligations of the people of the United States. And why? Logically so. You would do it and I would do it.

Great Britain is not moribund, it is true, because the British Empire is the great power of the world, the home of art and science. Whatever we may say upon the subject, and I to-day would declare war as soon as another to protect the autonomy of the American Republics or to free the people of Cuba from the horrible atrocities that are being perpetrated upon them, yet I recognize the fact that Great Britain is the home of freedom, of religion, of the arts, and her people have been foremost in every time and in every period of the world in standing forth as the very pillars of civilization and truth.

But that is not the question. Europe has 4,000,000 armed men, with a drain upon its resources which impoverishes its people, with an increasing army of unemployed people. At a low estimate there are 20,000,000 people in Europe at the point of starvation—strong men with their families dying of hunger and seeking employment which they can not find. Such is the testimony of the commander of the Salvation Army, an enlightened man, a true man, a self-sacrificing man. Such are the statistics of John Bright and other Englishmen who have given their lives to this question. Such are the statements of philanthropic Frenchmen. There are 4,000,000 armed men facing each other with the most terrible instruments of destruction and with a war imminent at any time which would wipe out the credit of those countries and their securities and destroy their national debt.

Then look at this country, richer than the richest of them, with seas around it, 3,000 miles away from any possible danger; with 70,000,000 free men, many of them enlightened, intelligent, capable of controlling the Government, who in time will wake up and see what is true and act upon it in public policies, whether I am right or whether I am wrong. That the credit of this great country and this great people, foremost in civilization, should be less than that of these moribund countries is a proposition that can not for a moment be entertained.

No, our credit can be sustained, our notes paid, our obligations met by the judicious issue of the credit notes of this Government receivable for all public dues and for all private debts. If it were not so, what individual here could not in the administration of his own private affairs, if of equal magnitude to those of the United States, by the judicious payment of gold or silver when needed, and by refusing it when combinations were made to destroy his credit, sustain it?

While I entertain these views, I concede the integrity of those who have different opinions. I concede their ability and patriotism; but to me it seems to be clear that we are upon the line where starvation divides the great mass of the people from a few who are enormously rich. We are upon the line of serious civil disturbance. We are upon the point where something more than the old words of party distinction and party difference must be used; where principles of public policy looking to the masses can and must hereafter be the dividing line; where policies must be instituted which will not permit the accumulation by individuals, through public franchises, of hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars. We must see that the stern hand of the power and majesty of the American people is placed upon taxation levied through franchises created by law. By this public policy and this alone can the Republic be preserved and fulfill its mission of greater happiness to all the people.

INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM AND PROTECTIVE TARIFF THE REMEDIES DEMANDED BY PRESENT CONDITIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, the alternative presented for the consideration and vote of the Senate by the pending bill is this: Shall we determine and vote, as required by the bill as it came from the House, that a further issue of the bonded indebtedness of this Government is, under existing conditions and circumstances, necessary, and to authorize such issue; or shall we, as proposed by the committee, deny such necessity and refuse to authorize a further issue of bonds, and instead thereof so legislate as to utilize silver, thus restoring it to the place assigned it by the Constitution of our country as one of the money metals, and thus rehabilitate it, as commanded by the Constitution, with all the legal-tender functions of primary money? In other words, shall we insist on perpetuating the single gold standard in this country and, in order to do so, authorize an unlimited amount of interest-bearing bonds to be sold for gold; or, denying that we favor the single gold standard and insisting that we favor bimetallism or the double standard, shall we, in the language of the last national Republican platform, declare that "the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism," and that, in the words of that platform, "we demand the use of both gold and silver as standard money," and not the single gold standard?

For one I deny the necessity for further bond issues. I deny the necessity for a further increase of the interest-bearing national indebtedness. I deny that the interest or welfare either of the Government or the people of this country requires the perpetuation of the single gold standard. I protest that the continued and persistent effort to destroy bimetallism in this country, and thus reduce the aggregate value of our entire property to a sum measured by our gold alone, is not only a fatal stab at the best material interests of all our people, save and except the few who control the gold of this country, but is, moreover, a dangerous and oppressive encroachment upon their constitutional liberties.

Believing this, I shall, without any hesitation, but with great pleasure, vote in favor of the committee amendment and against the bill as it came from the House.

GOLD AND SILVER ARE THE MONEY METALS OF THE CONSTITUTION, NOT GOLD ALONE.

The great convention which framed the Constitution of our country, in authorizing Congress to coin money, incorporated into that instrument no discriminating distinction between gold and silver.

The Congress shall have power—

Says the Constitution—to coin money—

Not gold alone, but money, that which was known as money in this country at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, namely, gold and silver coins, and furthermore—to regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins.

And while inhibiting the several States from coining money of any kind, and in determining to what extent they should go in declaring what should or should not be a legal tender, it was provided in express terms that:

No State shall * * * coin money—make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

In view of these constitutional provisions conferring upon Congress the power to coin money, both gold and silver, which is the equivalent of a command to coin for the use of the people both gold and silver, and inhibiting the States respectively from coining money and from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts, is it not clear beyond the power of successful disputation that any discrimination in our legislation upon the part of Congress against silver and in favor of gold is an encroachment upon the constitutional rights of the citizen?

That great lawyer, Daniel Webster, in discussing from a constitutional standpoint this very important question, said:

I am clearly of the opinion that neither Congress nor any other authority can legally demonetize either silver or gold. If one coin can be dethroned as money then the other one can be, and thus the Constitution can be disregarded, yes, overthrown. The command to Congress is to coin money, not to destroy it, to create legal-tender money for the use of the people, and the grant of authority to create money can not be construed to mean authority to destroy money.

But no less clear and conclusive upon this constitutional question were the well-timed and able remarks in this Chamber on the 15th of August, 1893, of Webster's worthy successor, Senator HOAR. On that occasion that eminent Senator said:

You may drive out nature with your legislative fork, but again and again she comes running back. This doctrine is recognized in the Constitution. "No State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender." "No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

That the words "money" and "gold and silver" were regarded as equivalents in constitutional meaning is shown by the fact that the Constitution makes a separate provision as to bills of credit and does not include them in the sentence which applies to money. It is not gold or silver that a State may make a legal tender, but gold and silver, the legal value of which, by another clause of the Constitution, is to be determined by Congress.

Chief Justice Ellsworth and his associate, who represented Connecticut in the Constitutional Convention, in their report to their constituents of the proceedings of the convention, say that the new Constitution provides that no State "shall make anything but money a legal tender for the payment of debts," showing that, in their judgment, the word "money" and the words "gold and silver" are identical or equivalents.

Alexander Hamilton considered this question in his great report on the mint and the coinage. He gave fullest weight to the arguments of the monometallists. He admitted that the money unit had up to that time virtually attached to gold rather than to silver. But, with the fullest concurrence of President Washington and the statesmen of his time, he declared for the principle of bimetallism. His arguments have not lost their original force. They have not been answered in any discussion. The people of the United States, when the tempest has passed, will settle down and be reconciled to the solution of this great problem in which Washington and his Cabinet joined. They never will be permanently reconciled to any other.

"To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from the comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation."—Hamilton's Report, Lodge's Edition, page 243.

Daniel Webster declared more than once, and with great emphasis, that the Constitution requires the coinage of both metals; and it would be a disobedience to our constitutional duty were Congress to discard either.

Mr. President, all our great financial authorities of both parties, from the framers of the Constitution, from Alexander Hamilton, and Jefferson, and Webster, and Calhoun, and Benton, and Chase, and Fessenden, Federalists and Republicans, Whigs and Democrats, down to the disturbed period which followed the war, have agreed upon this policy. There were differences which divided political parties. Whether Congress should authorize a paper currency, under careful safeguards, redeemable in coin, or should leave that to State discretion, or to private enterprise, was a question which divided parties and made and unmade Presidents and administrations. But down to the year 1863—down to the year 1863 it never was heard in this country that the legal tender and the standard of value should be anything but gold and silver; nor was it ever claimed until 1873 that both gold and silver could not be relied upon to perform this service.

And I call attention to the language of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—

THE CAUSES OF THE INCREASE IN OUR FOREIGN INDEBTEDNESS.

Let those who proclaim loudest against bimetallism and in favor of the single gold standard and in opposition to the restoration of silver to its constitutional place as one of the money metals of the country contrast for a moment the condition of our country and its Government and people in a few important respects for a period of, say, a quarter of a century prior to 1873, when silver was demonetized, and that for the twenty-five years since. Compare, for instance, the amount of our foreign indebtedness from 1845 to 1873 with that from 1873 to 1895.

First, glance at the state of our trade, its balances from 1845 to 1860, fifteen years prior to the breaking out of the war of the rebellion, when we had no single gold standard and when we had the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the present ratio of 16 to 1. During these fifteen years the net balance of our foreign trade in our favor was $33,712,009. Thus, so far from creating any foreign interest-bearing debt during this period, the result was a balance in our favor of $33,712,009.

Furthermore, it will be borne in mind that for these fifteen years our total net exports of gold and silver amounted to an annual average of but $27,412,220. At the commencement of the war, therefore, our foreign indebtedness was a mere bagatelle—substantially nothing.

Then came the war, bearing in its train, of course, a large deficit each year up to 1869, at which time our foreign indebtedness, as estimated by David A. Wells, had reached the enormous sum of $1,465,500,000. Much of this vast increase of course is justly chargeable to the state of war in which our country was engaged from 1861 to 1865.

During the nine years 1861–1869 the value of imports in excess of the value of our exports reached the enormous sum of $732,219,547, or an average annual excess for these nine years of $81,357,727. During this same period we exported more gold and silver than we imported to the aggregate amount of $439,678,760, or an average annual excess of gold and silver of $48,853,195. So, the balance against us for these nine years, covering the period of the war and four years after its close, growing alone out of our imports and exports of merchandise, gold, and silver was $292,540,787, or an annual average excess during this period of $32,504,532.

But this is but one item, and a comparatively insignificant one at that, in making up our estimated foreign debt by Mr. Wells in 1869. To this must be added an estimated loss of from $200,000,000 to $225,000,000, being cost of transportation of our carrying trade in foreign vessels, amount expended by Americans in traveling abroad of an equally large sum, to say nothing of accumulated interest and discounts on stock and bonds and real-estate mortgages taken by our European creditors at an average of not more than two-thirds of their value on our indebtedness. These various items of our indebtedness, accumulated in this brief period of nine years, make up the estimated aggregate of Mr. Wells of $1,465,500,000.

But, notwithstanding this increase in our foreign indebtedness during the nine years ended December 31, 1869, and the great bulk of which must be properly attributed to the fact that our country was involved in a terrible and prolonged internecine war, it was as nothing compared with the increase in the twenty-five years since that date, during twenty-three years of which time silver has been demonetized, real bimetallism strangled and destroyed, and our Government engaged in a constant and embarrassingly strained effort to maintain and perpetuate the single gold standard. While our foreign indebtedness was virtually nothing at the beginning of the war in 1860, while on January 1, 1870, it was, according to recognized national statisticians, $1,465,000,000, it is to-day, after nearly a quarter of a century of the single gold standard, estimated by these same statisticians at all the way from four to five times the latter amount, or from $5,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000, or an increase in our foreign indebtedness since 1870, after allowing all credits, of from $3,535,000,000 to $5,535,000,000. The first-named amount is a conservative estimate, and in all probability not very far wrong.

How is it this vast sum of debt has within the past twenty-five years been placed as a mortgage in favor of foreign creditors, nearly all of whom are citizens of Great Britian, on the labor, the efforts, the resources, the homes—yes; I might add the liberties—of the American people?

In what manner, for what cause or causes, by operation of what occult or other description of means, have the very lifeblood and liberties of the American people been thus manacled in the interest of foreign masters by this vast aggregation of individual foreign indebtedness? That it is the result wholly of any one cause no sensible man will for a moment contend. That it is the result of and the cooperation of several causes all will readily concede, but that of all causes which contribute to it more or less, no one cause, nay, all other causes taken together, were so potential a factor in this fearful work of riveting upon the necks of the American people the foreign chains of industrial, commercial, and monetary slavery as is the single one of the effort to destroy bimetallism and sustain, uphold, and perpetuate, in the interest of Great Britain, the single gold standard.

For the twenty-five years from June 30, 1870, to June 30, 1895, the aggregate value of our imports was in round figures about $16,000,000,000, while that of our exports was in round figures perhaps about $17,763,500,000, or an excess of merchandise exports over like imports of $1,763,500,000.

During this same period our net gold exports were $271,190,721, while our excess of exports of silver over imports of silver was $386,311,625. These figures show undoubtedly at first glance and on their face, other considerations for the moment lost sight of, an apparent balance in our favor, and due in the main to the operation of our system of a protective tariff, of $2,421,014,262. Hence the inquiry naturally arises, why is it, if during these twenty-five years there has been in our exports and imports of merchandise and gold and silver a balance in our favor of nearly $2,500,000,000, or nearly $100,000,000 annually, our foreign indebtedness has increased from $1,465,000,000 to over $5,000,000,000, and why is it, if there has been this vast annual increase in our foreign indebtedness, notwithstanding the balance of trade has been in our favor, that we have not been able to meet it, or, in other words, to prevent its gradual and immense accumulation?

The answer is apparent to all who have given the matter careful consideration.

Although we in these twenty-five years have sent to foreigners $657,502,346 more gold and silver than they have sent to us in the same time, and in addition have sent to them merchandise valued at $1,763,511,916 more than the value of the merchandise they have sent to us, making a total of merchandise, gold, and silver we have sent abroad in this period in excess of the value of these articles received by us of $2,421,014,262, or an excess of over $96,000,000 annually; and yet, notwithstanding all this, our indebtedness to foreigners increased in this same period to more than $3,500,000,000, showing clearly had the balance of trade on our exports of merchandise, gold, and silver been against us, or had our trade in these respects been evenly balanced, the increase in our foreign indebtedness in these twenty-five years ending with 1895, instead of being $3,500,000,000, would have been more than $5,900,000,000.

What is the cause of all this, and what is the remedy?

The cause is, this vast balance of trade in our favor during this period in merchandise, gold, and silver has gone to foreign lands, mostly to Europe, to meet the expenses of freight charges in our carrying trade, to pay interest on our foreign indebtedness, and the expenses of travel of Americans in Europe. This is the manner the debt has been created and is constantly accumulating, and we are unable to meet the interest, much less the principal, for the simple reason of the great depression in the value of our exports since 1873.

That is the sum and substance of the whole business. If our exports since 1873 could have commanded the same prices they did command in 1873, to-day the American people, instead of having a mortgage approaching perhaps five thousand million dollars upon their property, their homes, their very liberties, would be owing nothing.

There are, in my judgment, two remedies to be applied:

First, our shipping laws must be amended, our merchant marine must be encouraged and built up, and we must become our own carriers; and

Secondly, we must legislate to increase the value of our export commodities, so as to enable us to meet, reduce, and, if possible, wipe out the debt which to-day makes the people of this country virtually slaves to the money lenders of Great Britain. We must reduce our expenses, and instead of issuing new bonds stop incurring obligations abroad and increase, if possible, the value of our commodities, including silver, with which to meet this indebtedness.

But—

silver can not be utilized in paying our foreign debts.

To this I reply that the records of this Government show that between June 30, 1870, and June 30, 1895, we paid on this foreign account and canceled our indebtedness to that extent by preventing its increase, by payments in silver to the amount and value of $386,311,625, that being the excess in the value of our exports of silver during that period over our imports of silver.

As a matter of course that alone, amounting to nearly $400,000,000, was applied in the reduction of our indebtedness abroad and preventing its increase.

The enormous amounts paid by us annually to foreign shipowners is one of the great causes of the rapid increase of our foreign indebtedness. Less than 20 per cent of our imports—only about 13 per cent—are carried in American vessels, while about 87 per cent in foreign. The average cost of freightage is estimated at 8 per cent of the value of imports.

During the twenty-five years ended June 30, 1895, our aggregate imports were valued at $16,000,000,000. Assuming that but 87 per cent of this amount was carried in foreign vessels, the money paid to foreign shipowners during this period would average annually about $55,000,000 and would in the aggregate amount in this period to $1,392,000,000. If credit is given for, say, $175,000,000 as freight received by our own people for the small proportion of our exports carried by American shipping, there is still a balance against us for this period on the single item of freights of more than $1,200,000,000, or an average of $48,000,000 per annum.

THE FEARFUL EFFECTS OF THE BOND-ISSUING POLICY—IT CONTRACTS OUR CIRCULATING MEDIUM, DEPRESSES PRICES, PARALYZES BUSINESS, AND INCREASES THE PUBLIC DEBT.

But another, among the many evils which attach to a policy of borrowing millions every few months and issuing interest-bearing bonds in order to maintain the single gold standard, and the one to which I am about to attract attention, operates with especial hardship when the gold is obtained from our own people, is its effect in the contraction of our circulating medium. The contraction of the circulating medium of the country can not but depress prices, not only of commodities, but of labor as well, thus creating a stringency in the markets, lessening the ability of the banks to accommodate their customers with loans, and compelling a forced collection of loans already in existence, thus harassing, oppressing, and ruining debtors.

In a country where the total gold circulation is perhaps less than $250,000,000 what must be the effect of the sudden absorption of $100,000,000 of that amount? And so it is, while thus contracting the circulating medium of the country to this enormous extent, entailing in its operation all these evil results, it at the same time increases the strain upon the reserve of the country, constantly rendering the supply less capable of performing the function required of standard money, of money of ultimate redemption, for money that is in and of itself, not redemption money, and which itself must be redeemed, is not money at all, but simply a token, a note of demand, or a promise to pay, whether it be in the form of silver, or gold, or paper, or brass, or any other material.

As bearing upon this phase of the effect of bond issues when the bonds are expected to be taken by the people of our own country, I beg attention to the following extract from a very valuable communication published in the New York Sun in its issue of January 19, 1896:

Considerable apprehension is noticeable in financial circles at the prospect of the monetary stringency which, it is beginning to be understood, must follow the absorption by the Treasury of the $100,000,000 and more which it is going to receive for the new bonds. The modification of the terms of payment, making the installments of it smaller and spreading them over a longer period of time, is intended to allay this feeling, but its palliating effect will not be great. Wall street has a habit of discounting the future, and a result which is certain to take place at the end of four months has the same influence on the money market now that it would have if it were going to happen to-morrow. Already, as their successive weekly statements show, our banks are contracting their loans and increasing their reserves, in anticipation of the demands which will be made upon them when the first installment of $20,000,000 upon the bonds will fall due, and they are evidently putting themselves in a position to meet the calls for the remaining 80 per cent.

It will be interesting to observe how business men, especially that portion of them in this region who have been clamoring for the retirement and cancellation of the legal-tender notes, will take the contraction both of the currency and of bank credits which the successful placing of the new loan will entail. Allowing a probable disbursement for current expenses the next four months of $20,000,000 out of the $100,000,000 and upward of the proceeds of the loan, there will be a locking up in the Treasury of $80,000,000 at least. This will not only diminish the volume of money in circulation by over $80,000,000, but it will by something like four times its amount reduce the ability of the banks to accommodate borrowers. The vacuum may be filled, and ought to be filled to some extent, by gold imported from Europe, but it is an indispensable condition of this importation that the interest of money here should for a sufficiently long period remain high enough to attract hither foreign capital. Not the least of the blunders which have been made in regard to the new bond issue has been the dissemination of the fallacy that the Treasury reserve can be replenished and the maintenance of gold payments assured without reducing the volume of bank loans. Neither refusing payment in legal tenders, nor importation of gold to be exported again as soon as it has served its temporary purpose, nor extending the period of payment for the bonds, nor the enlargement of bank circulation, will avail to prevent it. It will be a bitter but a beneficial dose to swallow, and we must take it without making wry faces.

The historic literature of the world is replete with evidence tending to illustrate the fact that the single gold standard is fatal to the prosperity of the great masses of the people in any country where it is enforced. That the special few who, by reason of their wealth, their position, or their influence, control the gold of a country may be benefited, all will agree, but this is at the expense and sacrifice of the best interests of the many.

The doctrine of "the greatest good to the greatest number" finds no lodgment in a policy which upholds the single gold standard and rejects the policy of true bimetallism. The logic of the ablest economists who have ever written upon the subject, whatever may have been their final conclusions as to the best policy to be pursued, leads to this result. But among all the celebrated economic writers, both ancient and modern, upon this subject, none has brought to its consideration such unanswerable logic as Mr. Brooks Adams in his recent essay under the name of The Law of Civilization and Decay; and perhaps no better idea of this wonderful work may be obtained than by quoting the following reference to it in the columns of the New York Sun, a single gold standard paper, in its issue of January 12, 1896. It reads:

HISTORY SURVEYED FROM A NEW VIEW POINT.

It is a remarkable essay which Mr. Brooks Adams has written under the name of The Law of Civilization and Decay (Macmillan). It is remarkable alike for its researches and its deductions, and while perhaps few men will accept all of the author's conclusions, none will fail to be impressed by some of them. It is not needful to assent to his ultimate assertion that the adoption of the single gold standard is fatal to the prosperity of a community in order to appreciate the singular acumen of his comments on certain critical conjunctures in the story of the past. What he has done is to examine from the view point of political economy the rise and fall of the Romans, the earlier Middle Ages, the first two Crusades and the capture of Constantinople by the Latins, the suppression of the Order of the Templars, the English Reformation, and the suppression of the convents, the eviction of the yeomen in England, and the relations of Spain and India to eighteenth-century civilization. It is only in the final chapter, devoted to modern centralization, in which the expressions of opinion occur to which exception will generally be taken. Up to this point the author's essay is surprisingly full of penetration and illumination, and we do not hesitate to say that in respect of knowledge and of insight it deserves to rank in the class which is headed by the works of Montesquieu.

To indicate in one short paragraph the significance of this book, the author sums up the drift of European history during the seven hundred years which preceded the close of the Napoleonic wars. From the Crusades to Waterloo the producers dominated Europe, the money lenders often faring hardly, as is proved by the treatment of the Jews. From the highest to the lowest, all had wares to sell; the farmer his crop, the weaver his cloth, the grocer his goods, and all were interested in maintaining the value of their commodities relatively to coin, for they lost when selling on a falling market. By degrees, as competition sharpened, after the Reformation a type was developed which our author would call that of the merchant adventurer, men like Child and Boulton, energetic and audacious. Gradually energy vented itself more and more freely through these merchants, until they became the ruling power in England, their government lasting from 1688 to 1815. At length they fell through the very brilliancy of their genius. The wealth they had amassed so rapidly accumulated until it prevailed over all other forms of force, and by so doing raised another variety of man to power. These last were the modern bankers. With the advent of the bankers a profound change came over civilization, for contraction began. Self-interest had from the outset taught the producers that to prosper they should deal in wares which tended rather to rise than fall in value relatively to coin. The opposite instinct possessed the usurer. He found that he grew rich when money appreciated or when the borrower had to part with more property to pay his debt when it fell due than the cash lent him would have brought on the day the obligation was contracted. Inasmuch as toward the close of the eighteenth century the great hoards of London passed into the possession of men of the latter type, the third and most redoubtable variety of the economic intellect rose to prominence, a variety of which perhaps the most conspicuous example is the family of Rothschild.

Even conceding for the moment that the single gold standard is a good thing and ought to be maintained, which I most emphatically deny, the policy of our Government in paying gold to all comers, whether required for export or otherwise, and when the power to pay in either silver or gold is guaranteed to the Secretary of the Treasury by the very law creating the obligation, is not only not necessary to the preservation of the single gold standard, but is not in accordance with the policy of any single gold standard country in the world, and can but lead in the end to one result—national bankruptcy.

The relation existing between the banks of England, France, and Germany and private bankers, merchants, and exporters of those countries in reference to the redemption of their paper obligations is precisely similar to that existing between the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States and our private bankers, merchants, and exporters in reference to the redemption in coin of our national obligations. No one of these great gold-standard Governments, Great Britain, Germany, and France, if the last may be called a gold-standard country, considers it necessary, in order to maintain the gold standard, to pay out gold coin on every demand and on all occasions, and thus be compelled to purchase it back in order to replenish its treasury at advanced rates and great cost.

Whenever the Bank of England detects the existence of an effort to draw gold for export it immediately raises its rate of discount, and continues to raise it and maintain it until it becomes to the interest of the exporter to pause in his effort and leave the gold in the bank. Frequently has the Bank of England raised the rate of discount to 4, 5, and 6 per cent, and it has occasionally gone as high as 10 per cent, but not recently. At the Barings crash in 1889 the Bank of England advanced its rate to 6 per cent, and it was held at that rate for fifty-two consecutive days—from December 30, 1889, to February 20, 1890—while between 1882 and 1890 the rate of 5 per cent was reached on twelve different occasions, and at one time this rate was maintained continuously for one hundred and twenty-seven consecutive days.

So, too, the Bank of France invariably exercises the option when a demand is made on it for gold for export, and it is furnished or not as its directors determine.

So, too, with the Bank of Germany.

It is true the United States Government can not protect its reserves by this process; it can not raise the rate of discount, as it does not discount commercial paper; but it does possess a more direct and efficient power conferred upon it by the sovereign power of the State, and that is, when a demand is made for gold to export, by the presentation of either legal-tender or Treasury notes, to refuse to pay in gold alone, and tender any other legal-tender coin it may have, as none of these obligations are payable in gold coin, but expressly in coin—that is either gold or silver—and no requirement for the maintenance of the gold standard renders it imperative upon the part of the Government to redeem in gold coin an obligation made expressly redeemable in either gold or silver coin. By refusing to exercise his legitimate prerogative our Secretary of the Treasury "out-Herods Herod," and enforces a gold policy far in advance of any ever entertained or practiced by any gold-standard government on earth.

I was pleased to see that in a recent interview Hon. George H. Williams, of Oregon, late Senator and Attorney-General of the United States, if correctly reported, said:

Had I been Secretary of the Treasury I would have exercised my prerogative of redeeming the Treasury notes in silver when presented. That would have put an immediate quietus on this scheme of robbery.

So say I, Mr. President. Had the Secretary of the Treasury followed the policy of the law and the words of the law, had he protected the gold of the country in the Treasury by the payment of silver when he did not have gold to spare, a quietus would have been put upon the raids on the Treasury by the gold ring. Very few legal-tender notes or Treasury notes would have been presented if that kind of policy had been adopted, instead of the policy of attempting to redeem all the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes and the $150,000,000 of Sherman Treasury notes in gold coin instead of in coin, and we should not have had to borrow in less than two years, as has been done, $162,000,000, and there would have been no necessity for another issue of $100,000,000 of bonds, which it is expected will soon be issued.

THE DANGERS TO AMERICAN INDUSTRIES AND AMERICAN LABOR FROM AN INVASION OF ORIENTAL PRODUCTS AS A RESULT OF DIFFERENCE OF EXCHANGE AND MONEY STANDARDS.

It is incredible that the people and all the people of this country, irrespective of party, baptized as they have been during the past few years with the blighting mildew of financial and industrial ruin, can not comprehend that they are, by reason of the destruction of bimetallism and the operation of the single gold standard, coupled with a free-trade tariff, gradually but surely being made the slaves of the money lenders and bondholders of the world. But not only so. This is not all, but only one-half of the fearful story.

It is still more incredible that they can not be made to realize the great, transparent fact, so absolutely apparent, that the effect of the operation of the single gold standard is to bring our laborers, our manufacturers, our artisans, and our farmers as well, into direct and ruinous competition with the laborers, the manufacturers, the artisans, and the farmers of every silver-standard, silver-using country in the world.

We have as a nation proclaimed loudly and properly and legislated vigorously and wisely against Chinese immigration, but we are threatened to-day, and especially is this so with reference to the Pacific Coast States and Territories, with an industrial foe, a mighty, desolating army, in comparison with which Chinese immigration is an evil Lilliputian in character; and this state of things is not only made possible by the destruction of bimetallism in this country and by the practical operation of the single gold standard, but is actually generated, warmed into life, promoted, encouraged, and sustained by the monometallic gold policy.

But why—

Says the honest advocate of the single gold standard—is this so?

This is a pertinent and proper question and one susceptible of a direct and conclusive answer, which, when stated, must be apparent to every candid mind. The purchasing power of silver in all silver-using countries has not depreciated. It is as great to-day as ever before. The purchasing power of silver bullion even in this country is as great now as ever at any time in the past. Their standard of value is silver. The silver yen of Japan and the tael of China go just as far in paying wages, in tilling the ground, in the manufacture of and in operating machinery, in herding sheep, in growing cattle, in manufacturing cloth, as ever they did at any time heretofore, whereas gold in the single gold standard, gold-using countries has appreciated, as measured in silver, 100 per cent. Their products, their goods, therefore, are prepared for the market, even were there no difference in the cost of labor in the two countries arising out of diverse national and climatic conditions, at just one-half what it costs to produce the same articles in the gold-standard, gold-using countries; and what is the result? They, the Chinese and Japanese, the people of South and Central America, can afford, without trenching on their profits, to sell the produce of their farms, of their shops, of their factories, to the people of a gold-standard, gold-using country for just one-half the price in gold they would have been compelled to sell for if bimetallism had been maintained and the destruction of the parity of value between the two moneys had not been brought about by silver demonetization; hence as a consequence they can sell for just one-half that the farmers, the artisans, the manufacturers of the single gold standard and gold-using country can afford to and make any profit at all. I would ask my friends on the other side to make answer to this when they come to speak in favor of sustaining the single gold standard.

Here, then, the American farmer and manufacturer are brought into direct and deadly competition with the almost countless millions of Asia—a competition that would be sufficiently paralyzing by reason of the difference of conditions growing out of the difference of nationality, of climate, and of civilization, even when the difference in the purchasing power of gold and silver did not exist, but rendered absolutely ruinous and completely and disastrously destructive in every sense of the term when aggravated by the disparity in the purchasing and debt-paying power of gold and silver brought about by the enforcement of a monetary policy that makes gold, and gold alone, in our country the measure of value.

Here, then, is a threatened industrial invasion which no tariff, however high its rates, can protect against. Who does not realize that the people of China and Japan are rapidly forging ahead, moving rapidly to the front in every department of invention, of manufacture, and of industrial life? Go into any city or town or hamlet of the Pacific States; go into many of the great cities of the East—New York, Philadelphia, Boston—and there you see innumerable evidences in a great variety of stores and shops of the industry, the ingenuity, the inventive genius of the Chinese and Japanese laborers, artisans, and manufacturers who came to this country prior to the passage of our exclusion laws. But all this, and it is not by any means insignificant in the Pacific States and Territories, is but a mere bagatelle compared with the mighty avalanche of Asiatic products of farm and shop and factory which is clearly gradually making its way toward our shores, steadily, but ever onward, like the imperceptible movement of a mighty and destructive glacier, to ultimately overwhelm the people of this country, and especially of the Pacific Coast, and thus destroy its industries, ruin its people, and cast a deadly blight on its civilization.

The progress made by Japan in recent years in manufactures has no parallel in any other country in the same length of time. A dozen years ago a spindle in Japan was a novelty; to-day there are 59 cotton mills, representing 838,000 of the 86,000,000 spindles of the world, now engaged in whirling the raw cotton into manufactures of all kinds, and it is estimated the present enterprises under way will in less than a year result in placing in operation 700,000 additional spindles. Every vessel now leaving California ports for the Orient is laden with raw cotton to meet the demand of the Japanese manufacturers, but the price is weighed down to less than living rates by cargoes from the cotton-producing fields of cheap labor in India, with which our cotton producers of the South are brought in competition, and which, with the inevitable increase in the growth of cotton in China, will soon shut out the American product entirely, and these same ships return with large cargoes of manufactured goods to compete with the American laborer and the American manufacturer, to reduce their profits and ruin their trade.

It is said the match trade alone of this country is already ruined. Cargoes of Japanese matches are sold in our markets at prices against which our people can not compete, thus closing our match factories and throwing thousands of our people out of employment.

The same will soon be true of the trade in bicycles, which are now being imported into this country by the thousand at rates that will crush out the American manufacturers.

It is a fact that must be apparent to the mind of every candid and intelligent person who has investigated the subject that just so long as silver remains the money standard of the principal competitors for our commodities, our staple products, just so long will the producers of this country be compelled to contend and compete with cheap labor and cheap money, and the loss to the United States in the price of our cereals, due to the depreciation of silver as measured in gold in the silver-standard nations, will be infinitely greater than the loss to this nation by the contraction of our primary money or by the closing of our silver mines and the decrease in business of other industries resultant from cessation of operation in special industries.

THE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT OF JAPAN.

Japan has a population of 7,000,000 more than one-half our own population, more than 4,000,000 more than Great Britain.

She is forging ahead in the building up of a great merchant marine. She has in the past two years doubled the number of her seagoing vessels, and in that same brief period nearly trebled the number of tons of aggregate displacement of her vessels.

A nation which enforces compulsory primary education, which fosters vast numbers of normal schools and other institutions for the advancement of literary and scientific knowledge, and which supports nearly 2,000 educational institutions for the purpose of dispensing professional learning; which has within the past few years constructed more than 2,000 miles of railroad, established great steamship lines, connecting her ports with Hongkong, Shanghai, Calcutta, and other Chinese and East Indian ports; which is projecting further and still more important transoceanic lines to Australia, European, and American ports; a nation which, moreover, has in the past two years, by the terrible process of war on sea and land, conquered the Chinese Empire, with its more than 400,000,000 population—such a nation must not be omitted in the enumeration or estimates of powerful and influential factors which operate in defining and measuring the progress and advancement of nations, and the development of the civilization of the age.

Japan is rich in natural resources—gold, silver, iron, copper, coal, and valuable stone of various kinds—not the least of which among her mineral resources are her precious metals. The Portuguese, history tells us, during the eighty-nine years they occupied Japan—from 1550 to 1639—exported fifty-nine and a half million pounds sterling, or nearly $300,000,000, or about $3,300,000 annually in gold; and from 1649 to 1671 the Dutch exported from Japan large quantities of gold, also silver and copper; and it is recorded that the total value of gold and silver alone sent out of Japan during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries exceeded £103,000,000.

Already Japan excels in decorative art, in pottery and porcelain, their lacquer ware, their medals and bronzes, their cloisonné, their champlevé and repoussé work, their carving, their textile fabrics, and their embroidery, to say nothing of their products of cotton and wool, and the day is not far distant—it is even here now—when all these products of the cheap skilled labor of the Orient, with the additional advantages which accrue to them by reason of the difference in money standards between their country and ours, are coming, and will continue to come, upon us by the shipload, to compete with the manufacturers of like articles in this country, and to the displacement of the American laborer, the American artisan, and the American manufacturer.

Coal mining in Japan, which some years ago was practically abandoned has, by reason of the advancement in the silver price of coal resulting from the difference between the standards of silver-using and gold-using countries, been resumed on an extensive scale, and to-day the great ports on all sides of the Pacific Ocean are supplied from Japan, while the coal-mining industry of the Pacific States of our own country is being seriously threatened by large importations of Japanese coal.

Although Australia abounds in valuable coal fields, she is now virtually excluded from the Pacific Coast markets for the sole reasons—

First. Because, being on the gold basis, the difference of cost is 50 per cent against her; and Second. Because her European laborers can not and do not work on a scale of labor rates that those of China and Japan do.

A recent report of our consul-general in Japan, in speaking of the cotton industry of that country, says:

The rapid progress of the industry is indicated by the fact that there are in operation and in course of construction 48 factories, aggregating 1,819,115 spindles.

The following, from a recent consular report of the industries of Kobe, Japan, will illustrate the healthy condition and prosperity of manufacturing industries in that silver-using country, and I do not refer to this at this time for the purpose of endeavoring to prove that it is a good thing to be on a silver basis, but rather for the purpose of demonstrating beyond the possibility of refutation the great advantage the manufacturers of Japan have over the gold-standard countries as a necessary result of the difference in standards and exchange between the gold and silver standard countries.

The quotation is as follows:

In the consular report on trade at Kobe, for 1892, a return is given of the dividends paid during the preceding twelve months by 21 mills in Osaka. The average dividend was 18 per cent, the highest being 28 per cent and the lowest 8 per cent. The dividends for 1893, as reported from time to time in the Japan newspapers, appear to have been equally good or better. According to a recent number of the Japan Gazette, 11 mills, whose names are given, paid an average dividend of 16 per cent for the first six months of 1894, as compared with 12 per cent for the corresponding period of 1893.

Why is that, Mr. President? Not alone because that country is on a silver standard, but it is because of the fact that it has an advantage by being able to sell its products in a gold-standard country, whether in Europe or America, for just one-half what the American or the European product can be sold for and a profit made upon it.

The British consul-general, Jamieson, at Shanghai, whose essay in the recent bimetallic prize contest took the prize, in referring to the foregoing report, contrasted the prosperous condition of the manufacturers in Kobe, Japan, with the cotton manufacturers in England, and said:

Compare this with the account of the cotton trade in England, as given in the Economist of February 17 of this year. I can not afford room to quote passages, but, briefly, the balance sheets of 93 spinning companies in Oldham show a net total loss of £72,768 in 1893, against a like net loss of £104,664 in 1892. At the end of 1890 only 8 of these companies had adverse balances, and these amounted to only £8,412; at the close of 1891, 49 companies had adverse balances, amounting to £142,767; and at the close of 1893, 63 companies had realized a total loss of £366,800 on their working account.

Surely there is something seriously alarming in these figures. Have our manufacturers, with all their accumulated wealth of experience, become so effete that they allow themselves to be beaten at their own trade by amateur spinners in Japan? Or is it not that there is some enormous difference in the economic conditions of the two countries which enables the Eastern manufacturer to win without effort while the Western is struggling his hardest to get even a place in the race?

It has not unfrequently been said that it is some consolation to us, in the midst of all our depression of trade, to find that other countries, such as Germany and the United States, are in an equally bad condition. But I would venture to suggest that this exactly emphasizes the present contention, viz, that the countries that are suffering by reason of the fall in silver are the gold-standard countries, and those that are reaping the benefit are the silver countries.

But while Japan is perhaps not well adapted to the production of cotton, it has been demonstrated that large areas in China are, and a quality equal to that of our own American production can be and is being produced there. Already there are three mills in operation in Shanghai, running 66,200 spindles; three more are about ready to start, with 49,000 additional spindles, and still three more are projected, and the British consul-general there says it will be but a brief time until in that single city there will be nine mills in operation, with a spinning capacity of 265,200 spindles.

As bearing upon this general subject, I ask to incorporate in my remarks the following extract from the Item, of Philadelphia, Pa., of December 14 last, and which has been quoted heretofore in this debate:

[From the Item, Philadelphia, Pa., December 14, 1895.]

The Japanese consul-general at New York says that he thinks Japan is on the eve of building up a large trade of Japanese products in the United States. He says Japan has an ample supply of low-cost coal and is buying and making the best machinery for a large export trade.

He adds that hemp and cotton carpets, wall paper, copper and bronze ware, crystal ware, silk handkerchiefs, raw silk, pongee, umbrellas, rags, beer, tobacco, coal, and matches are among the leaders.

Besides these, Japanese agents are now offering bicycles at $12.50; sashes, doors, and blinds, and wool carpets at astonishingly low prices; in fact, no line is now drawn limiting what that country proposes to do in selling to the United States as well as to all gold-basis countries so long as silver continues depreciated.

Take the above bicycle as an example for all the other goods. It is claimed equal to the best in this country, and at the price mentioned is delivered duty and freight free in San Francisco.

The $12.50 received for each bicycle is in gold. This is sold for silver, equaling $20 to the Japanese manufacturer. He pays $15 of his silver dollars for making, freight, duties, etc., and clears a net profit of $5 in silver.

This same method of profit is available to the Japanese for everything they are able to produce, as well as selling coal in the San Francisco market.

The consul-general says that coal would be so sold now if the ships had a return cargo.

As further bearing upon this menace from Japan to labor, I beg attention to the following article recently published in the Chicago Evening Post:

JAPAN'S MENACE TO LABOR.

[From the Chicago Evening Post.]

When Japan entered the sisterhood of civilized nations no power gave her a warmer welcome than the American Republic. We extolled her energy, her ingenuity, and her enterprise, and hailed her as the "United States of the East."

To-day we are face to face with the hard fact that this young-old Empire—old in years and young with the vigor of a new civilization—is already proving a formidable rival to us in the markets of the world and at our own doors. The conditions of Japanese labor are a standing menace to American labor and trade. The gravity of this danger was illustrated yesterday in a report presented to the National Association of Manufacturers at Central Music Hall. It was pointed out by the chairman of the committee on Oriental industries that articles of Japanese manufacture now appear in our Eastern cities, rivaling and underselling American articles suitable for similar purposes. Japanese matting is now crowding out cheaper kinds of Philadelphia carpets.

Japanese rugs made in imitation of American patterns are sold in large quantities in preference to American rugs of higher value. Brushes are sold at retail in Eastern cities for about the American value of the unmanufactured bristles. American watch-case makers are selling to Japan cases for excellent movements made there for this market. There are 46 cotton mills in Japan, with about 600,000 spindles. New mills are being erected and Japan threatens to become a bold and large competitor for the trade of the world in cotton fabrics. The Japanese use the latest improved American and European machinery in this and other industries established by them. They begin with mechanical appliances that are superior to those found in some American mills.

There is no use blinking the facts. Some of our manufacturing industries are gravely menaced by this rivalry of a country where skilled labor may be had at the cost of 10 cents or 15 cents a day, or less than one-tenth of the cost of such labor in our own country. To-day tens of thousands of our laborers are idle. Our markets are invaded and the American workman, like the American manufacturer, is the victim of an Oriental competitor in whom rare skill and fine taste are joined with a simplicity of domestic habits which enables him to support life in comfort upon a tenth of what it costs to do this in the United States.

This competition will grow keener and keener. Japan will not confine herself to her present efforts. Her people are introducing a great variety of manufacturing industries, all using improved machinery, and they are imitating the patterns and inventions of the Western nations with impunity, because there is no protection for either the patents or trade-marks of foreigners in Japan. The importance of this condition of things can not be overestimated.

THE GREAT WANT OF THE PACIFIC COAST STATES AND TERRITORIES IS THE DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

The great want of the people of the Pacific Coast is the development and the building up of manufactures. Heretofore all their surplus moneys have been exported East, to Europe, the Sandwich Islands, and elsewhere, to pay for manufactured articles, every one of which can be and should be manufactured at home, thus accomplishing the double purpose of retaining our money, building up our industries, working up our raw material, which is abundant, and giving lucrative employment to our people. These industries are in their infancy on that coast. For a time they were seriously threatened with cooly labor from China; now, Chinese immigration having been in a great measure stopped by Congressional legislation, a new and more dangerous element threatens to strangle our infant manufactures in that region, and retard their expansion and growth.

As bearing upon this question, I beg to quote from a recent communication, dated November 30, 1895, from William M. Bunker, the editor in chief of the Daily Report of San Francisco:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., November 30, 1895.

The Daily Report of November 23 gave details of a Japanese invasion of the American markets. Articles of Japanese manufacture since the close of their war are being received of equal quality with American manufactured goods, and at prices so low that our manufactories of these articles must close unless relieved by Congressional action. Report stated that H. E. Reynell, of Kobe, Japan, established an agency in San Francisco, in the Crocker Building, Mr. Edward O. Burns being their agent, for the sale of Japanese manufactured goods for the purpose of underselling American products. Similar agencies are being established East and West now by representatives of Japanese houses. The agency here is now selling the best parlor matches in tin-lined box, in box and case lots of 50 gross in a case, delivered to the merchant freight and duty paid, at 30 cents per gross. He also sells doors, sashes, blinds, and all articles of wooden ware, cooperage stock, etc., of Japanese manufacture at from 30 to 50 per cent less than they can be manufactured for in this country, with all freight and duty paid by the Japanese importers; also clocks, watches, bicycles, boots, shoes, clothing, hats, caps, gloves, fancy goods, and notions on similar terms. Their agents are buying cotton-mill machinery and shipping to Japan and will take our cotton from here to Japan and send it back manufactured for less than it can possibly be manufactured in this country. They also take cargoes of Pacific Coast lumber, manufacture the same in Japan into wooden ware, etc., and return same here manufactured at 50 per cent less than our manufacturers' wholesale prices.

A meeting has been called in San Francisco for the Chamber of Commerce, Board of Trade, and Manufacturers' Association to memorialize Congress for relief. The appraiser of the port of San Francisco, in an interview with the editor of the Report, speaks of largely increased importations of Japanese goods of all kinds. He also notes a change in silk goods. They were formerly all white, but are now colored to beat the coloring of France or America.

The slight temporary benefit which may accrue to our people from an enlargement of our lumber and cotton market in Japan will hardly compensate for the incalculable damage that must ultimately and inevitably come to every class of our people, including our producers of lumber and cotton, and especially to our farmers and wage workers and artisans, by being compelled to enter a competitive race on our own shores with the manufactured products and the raw materials as well of the cheap labor of China and Japan, coupled with the additional advantages those countries possess by reason of the difference in money standards and the resulting difference in exchange.

A fair illustration of the manner in which our country suffers in competition with Great Britain in trade in the West Indies by paying gold for silver-made goods is found in the following article in a recent issue of the American Economist:

PAYING GOLD FOR SILVER-MADE GOODS.

The neighboring British possessions in the West Indies and Guiana are not very lucrative to the United States as far as trade is concerned. During the last five years we have bought to the extent of $67,556,530 from the British West Indies, selling them only $42,230,435 worth of our American products. From British Guiana, in the five years, we bought $21,021,262, selling only $9,913,067. The balance of trade was $36,435,000 against us in these two instances, so that John Bull is not losing everything in his transactions with us.

Again, looking at our trade with British India and the British East Indies, we find that where we sold to them to the extent of $18,410,214 in the last five years, we have bought as much as $110,194,324 of the products of Lascar labor, this balance of trade being against us to the extent of $91,784,110. But this is not the only gain to the British Empire. These Indian goods were made by Lascar labor, which was paid in silver coin, and the material of which they are constructed was paid for in silver. John Bull, however, won't take silver payment from us for them. We have to foot his bills with gold coin, and a pretty little profit he makes by the transaction.

Should this country persist in rejecting bimetallism, in repudiating the double standard, and insist on perpetuating the single gold standard, the time will soon come when the manufacturers of New England, as well as those of the Pacific Coast, not only of cotton and of wool, but of almost every character of manufactured product, will be brought to a full realization of the disadvantages under which they labor in being brought into direct competition at home as well as abroad with the manufactured products of like character imported from the Orient. They will, furthermore, be brought to realize the great fact that the advantages of the Oriental silver-using countries are such, by reason of the difference of standard and of exchange, that no tariff, however high the rates, can erect a wall sufficiently high to protect the manufacturers and people of this country against the invasion of their products. Two remedies, coupled together, alone will suffice—

First. The abandonment of the single gold standard by this country and the adoption of the double standard and of true bimetallism; and Second. A protective tariff.

THE INCREASE OF THE PUBLIC DEBT IN ORDER TO MAINTAIN THE SINGLE GOLD STANDARD.

I decline to give further authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue additional bonds in time of peace—

First. Because I deny the necessity for any such additional issue;

Second. Because I am unalterably opposed to a further increase of our interest-bearing public debt;

Third. Because in encouraging additional bond issues at any rate of interest I believe we are, instead of sustaining the public credit, but hastening the rapid approach of national bankruptcy; and Fourth. Because I am a Republican, and every Republican convention of every State in the Union which has convened in the last year has condemned in emphatic terms the present Administration for issuing bonds, and thus increasing the national indebtedness.

I am unwilling under any plea of necessity to aid the party to which I belong in doing that which as a party it has most emphatically condemned in others.

Think for one moment of the magnitude of the increase of our public debt in the last two years. The interest alone on this increase, to say nothing of the principal, will amount at the maturity of the bonds to $120,000,000. This interest account will be increased over $70,000,000 by the further issue of $100,000,000 bonds now about to be made, and bids for which have been called, thus making a total increase in the principal of the public debt in less than two years of $262,602,245.67, with an aggregate of interest to be paid on this amount of the enormous sum of $190,000,000, thus making a sum total to be paid by the people of $452,602,245.67, as the result of the policy of borrowing money to sustain the single gold standard; and notwithstanding all this, we have less gold in the Treasury, or, at least, not more than a fraction more now than we had two years ago; I do not know that we have as much, exactly; I do not precisely know how that is. And still further, during all this period there has been a constant excess of expenditures over receipts amounting for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, to $69,803,260.58; for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, to $42,805,223, and for the six months prior to December 1, 1895, to $17,613,539.24, aggregating in all to December 1 last a deficit of $130,221,023; and still the deficit continues; it goes on and increases.

As bearing upon the attitude of the Republican party upon the propriety and necessity for further increasing the bonded indebtedness of the country, I attract attention to the following resolutions in the platforms of several of the Republican State conventions held within the past year, and heretofore quoted elsewhere in this debate:

REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTIONS CONDEMN BOND ISSUES.

[Massachusetts Republican, October 5, 1895.]

The last Congress provided a revenue shamefully inadequate, and by the issue of bonds shifted onto succeeding Administrations the burden of their outlay.

[New York Republican, September 17, 1895.]

We denounce the Democratic Administration for its gross mismanagement of the finances of the nation. It already has added more than $165,000,000 to the national debt and the burdens of the people, and there is every evidence that this increase is to be continued.

[Kentucky Republican League Clubs, May 1, 1895.]

We believe in the doctrine of protection to American labor, American industries, and American homes; and we attribute the unparalleled business depression of the country to the utter failure of the Democratic Administration in its management of both foreign and domestic affairs, which has created national distrust and general paralysis, has driven capital from the factories and labor into the streets, reduced the revenues of the Government, and increased its bonded indebtedness.

[Ohio Republican, May 28, 1895.]

We denounce the present Democratic Administration, whose vicious and vacillating course has brought us distress at home and humiliation abroad. It has inaugurated a policy looking toward ultimate free trade, which has deranged business, crippled our industries, distressed our homes, and dealt labor a serious blow. With deplorable incompetency it has failed to raise revenue enough to run the Government and has had to borrow, in less than two years, $162,000,000 mainly to pay ordinary running expenses, selling in secret to favored foreign syndicates the bonds of the Government at prices far below their actual value.

[Pennsylvania Republican, August 28, 1895.]

Charges upon the Democratic party the fault for a constantly growing deficit in receipts, as compared with expenditures, thus compelling the borrowing of money in large amounts at exorbitant premiums in time of peace to maintain the credit of the Government. For the failure of the Democratic Administration to provide sufficient revenue to meet the wants of the Government "its responsibility is absolute, and it has exhibited to the world such inability and faithlessness in the discharge of the high trust committed to its care that its history continues to excite the contempt and distrust of all thoughtful citizens."

[Utah Republican, 1895.]

The first State Republican convention of Utah was held at Salt Lake City August 28, 1895. The platform adopted was as follows:

"We condemn the action of the present National Administration for issuing Government bonds in time of peace to meet a deficit caused by unwise and un-American legislation, and for its unprecedented and unpatriotic coalition with a syndicate of foreign money lenders to procure the sale of Government bonds adversely to the interests of the people."

Do the people of this country, do the Republicans who were so clamorous for the repeal of the Sherman Act, fail to remember the loud and almost universal prediction that was drummed in the ears of those of us who opposed that repeal to the effect that the repeal of that legislation was all that was required to stop the export of gold, stay the dark shadows of panic and depression, and bring prosperity to the country? Well, the Sherman law was repealed in the fall of 1893, and what was the result?

Contrast the conditions of the movement of the export of gold for a period shortly prior to the passage of the Sherman Act of July 14, 1890, to the date of its repeal with the period that has passed since the date of its repeal; and further contrast the condition and prosperity of our country and people during these two periods; and then it will be seen how well founded were the predictions of those who so confidently and dogmatically asserted that all that was needed to bring prosperity and stay the flow of gold from this country was the repeal of that act.

The following extract from a recent able speech of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] delivered in this Chamber on the 3d of the present month will most conclusively show how erroneous were all these predictions, and furthermore that the condition of the country is not chargeable to the existence of legislation in the interest of silver. The extract is as follows:

I have a graphic map attached to the Secretary's report of 1894, which shows the amount of gold in the Treasury from 1879 to July 1, 1894. It steadily and almost continuously increased from $140,000,000 on the 1st of January, 1879, to $300,000,000 on the 1st of January, 1891. It then steadily decreased to the 1st of July, 1894, when it was reduced to $125,000,000, and, though replenished by the large sale of bonds, it was reduced December 31, 1895, to the sum of $64,204,651.

During the first term of Mr. Cleveland, when he was powerless to affect our currency and tariff policy, the Senate being Republican, the gold increased from $240,000,000 on the 1st of April, 1885, to $320,000,000 on the 1st of April, 1889. This gold came into the Treasury without cost in exchange for United States notes or gold certificates.

It is just to Mr. Carlisle to say that he attributes the withdrawal of gold to silver legislation, yet the Bland-Allison Act was in force from 1878 to 1890, when the accumulation of gold occurred, and the great body of gold was withdrawn after the act of July 14, 1890, was repealed.

Yet the Senator from Ohio was foremost among Senators and others who insisted that all that was necessary to stop the flow of gold from this country and to bring prosperity was to repeal the Sherman Act. It was repealed, not by my vote; I admit that; but it was repealed nevertheless. Now the distinguished Senator from Ohio comes into the Senate and tells us that the great body of the $300,000,000 of gold that vanished from this country was withdrawn after the act of July 14, 1890, was repealed. So even the best of those with whom we associate can be mistaken sometimes as to the probable effect of legislation.

From this statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, which is accurate, it is shown that from the period shortly prior to the passage of the act of 1890, generally known as the Sherman Act, till a period shortly prior to its repeal, the gold in the Treasury constantly increased from $140,000,000 to $300,000,000, and since that period, in the language of the distinguished Senator, "the great body of gold being withdrawn after the act of July 14, 1890, was repealed," although replenished by borrowing $162,000,000 in gold, there was in the Treasury on December 31, 1895, but $64,204,651 in gold, and to-day, January 30, 1896, but $49,733,691.47.

Commencing with March 1, 1889, but sixteen and one-half months prior to the passage of the Sherman Act of July 14, 1890, until March 7, 1893, seven months prior to its repeal, our Government reduced the public indebtedness to the amount of $236,527,666.10, whereas since the date of its repeal it has been increased $162,602,245.27, with every prospect of a further increase in the next ten days of another $100,000,000.

THE SINGLE GOLD STANDARD AND A FREE-TRADE TARIFF BREED FAILURES AND DISTRESS.

The effect of the maintenance and enforcement of the single gold standard and a free-trade tariff for the past two years is plainly exemplified in the number and extent of business failures in this country during this time.

The figures are as follows:

Section.	Number of failures—		Liabilities—
	1894.	1895.	1894.	1895.
Eastern	1,784	1,686	$18,790,018	$19,914,153
Middle	3,018	3,082	51,493,787	51,239,432
Western	2,885	3,218	30,168,654	32,727,634
Northwestern	1,247	1,324	15,201,215	19,216,225
Southern	2,202	2,185	21,285,698	24,811,939
Pacific	1,182	1,180	10,608,257	9,211,208
Territories	403	338	2,077,805	1,721,854
United States	12,721	13,013	149,595,434	158,842,445

From this it will be seen, notwithstanding the assertion of business improvement in this country, there have been in these two years 25,734 failures, with liabilities amounting in the aggregate to $308,437,879. But not only so. There have been 292 more failures during the year 1895 than in 1894, with liabilities in excess of those of 1894 of $9,247,011.

DEPRESSION IN VALUES THE RESULT MAINLY OF THE EFFORT TO MAINTAIN THE SINGLE GOLD STANDARD.

The price of every product of the farm for the past few years and at present is such that it will not, as a general rule, meet the cost of production, to say nothing of any compensation for the farmer's labor—to say nothing of profit—and as a result, although crops are abundant, farmers are unable to pay their taxes. Why is this? It is insisted by many it is the result of overproduction, improvement in machinery, and like causes. In my judgment, after careful study, I believe it to be attributable, more than to all other causes combined, to the attempted destruction of bimetallism in the world and the effort to erect and enforce the single gold standard, thus measuring all values by gold alone, instead of by gold and silver. And on this question I will quote the opinion of an eminent gold standard advocate, who, as statistician, is in the employ of the London Board of Trade.

Mr. Giffen, this great English statistician, although an advocate of the single gold standard, in his Essays on Finance, in speaking on this subject, says:

But the answer clearly is that in the period between 1850 and 1865 and down to 1873 the increase of banking facilities and similar economies was as great relatively to the arrangements existing just before as anything that has taken place since. The same reply may also be made to the suggestion that the multiplication of commodities accounts for the entire change that has occurred. There is no reason to suppose that the multiplication of commodities relatively to the previous production has proceeded at a greater rate since 1873 than in the twenty years before that, yet before 1873 prices were rising notwithstanding the multiplication of commodities, and since that date the tendency has been to decline. The one thing which has changed, therefore, appears to be the supply of gold and the demands upon it; and to that cause largely we must accordingly ascribe the change in the course of prices which has occurred.

Mr. Giffen further says:

The question then arises on these figures whether the depression at a time like the present may not be largely due to some permanent cause which has lately begun to operate. Two causes only have been suggested. One is a great multiplication of commodities and diminution of the cost of production due to the progress of invention, improved facilities of communication, lower freights, international telegraphy, and the like circumstances. The other is that the precious metal used for standard money, viz, gold, has become relatively scarcer than it was, its production being diminished on the one hand and demands for it on the other hand increased. The former of these causes was discussed quite lately by Mr. Fowler in the Contemporary Review, and a greater weight assigned to it than to the latter cause. I am disposed to give the greater weight to the latter.

That is to say, Mr. Giffen ascribes the great depression in prices to the fact that standard money, namely, gold, has become relatively scarcer than it was, by reason, first, of its diminished production on the one hand, and secondly, the demands for it on the other hand having increased, and this is the cause of the great depression in values of all commodities.

BORROWED MONEY CAN NOT CREATE PERMANENT PROSPERITY.

This country can never be made rich or prosperous by continuing in time of peace a policy of borrowing money. Money can only be retained in a country when it is money that comes to it as the result of a balance of trade—when the value of exports exceeds the value of imports—when it is money earned. Money borrowed or money obtained by makeshift or artifice is in no sense wealth, nor will it remain in a country, nor can the wit of man invent any system that will prevent its export. Its withdrawal is inevitable, passing into other and foreign channels with greater alacrity than it was received, and when it thus takes its departure a country is in a far more embarrassed condition than before it commenced to put forth efforts to secure it by the issuance of notes or bonds. It can at most only create a shadowy, illusive, and transitory prosperity.

This country can not long continue itself upon a gold basis by borrowing money by driblets or even by the hundreds of millions, neither can prosperity be restored or maintained by issuing bonds to be sold ostensibly at public outcry, but eventually to be taken by a syndicate in New York or London, nor the national credit be maintained by transferring the duty of protecting it to the care of a few gentlemen in the city of New York, whose patriotism is circumscribed by the selfish rules of cent-per-cent, and whose heroism in the cause of the amelioration of poverty and human suffering, and national credit, and national prosperity, is manifest in a keen desire to coin a golden profit out of the necessities and misfortunes of their country.

WHAT IS MEANT BY THE TERMS "SOUND MONEY"?

Much is said these later times about "sound money." The terms are iterated and reiterated in message, in document, in newspaper, and in public speech. And what does it mean?

If it means that the gold dollar and its multiple can only be rightfully denominated sound money, then I most emphatically deny the proposition. If it means to imply that either a silver dollar or a legal-tender dollar, whose purchasing and debt-paying power is equal to the gold dollar, is not sound money, then I deny that. If it means, furthermore, that a gold dollar, which has appreciated from 30 to 50 per cent, and to that extent has reduced the price of farm products and every other commodity, is a better dollar, a sounder dollar, or even as good a dollar or as sound a dollar as is the nondepreciated silver dollar which passes at par in every part of the Union, or a legal-tender dollar, which is kept at par and redeemable on presentation in coin, then I deny that.

If, moreover, by the terms "sound money" is only meant that kind of money that passes in coinage form as money in all the single gold standard countries of the world, then I deny that the terms are properly applied, as I believe a great nation like ours, with its vast territory, its 70,000,000 people, its immeasurable resources, its internal commerce, and its almost unlimited amount of business, is not only capable of having, but in the interest of all concerned, in my judgment, should have a domestic money of its own, kept at par and good as a home-purchasing and debt-paying medium in every State and Territory in the Union, and upon every foot of American soil. With such a domestic circulating medium, in sufficient but not in redundant or inflated quantity, coupled with a protective tariff, the industries of this country would no longer languish, the wheels of its factories would be put in motion, labor would find profitable employment, our home market would be enlarged, and our farmers would receive a fair price for their products, and thus be enabled to pay their taxes, something they are unable to do now.

If, furthermore, by the terms "sound money" the impression is intended to be conveyed that all values must be measured by a single gold standard, and only this is sound money, and that the principle of bimetallism—or the double standard, as it is sometimes erroneously, as I think, called—is wrong and should be repudiated as unsound, then I deny that, and I protest that such a doctrine was never yet declared by any of the great parties of this country in any national platform during or since the days of Washington, and it is, moreover, in flagrant conflict with the policy enunciated in every national platform of every party heretofore adopted in this country, and particularly that of the Republican party, which is pledged unalterably to the policy of bimetallism and against the single gold standard—to the policy of the use of both gold and silver as standard money.

If, however, by the terms "sound money" is meant simply that any dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, which can not be and is not kept in this country in debt-paying and purchasing power the equal of every other dollar, then I might be willing to admit their proper application if the terms "sound money" mean anything at all, and for one I do not believe they do, or that they are more than a meaningless catch phrase, coined and used for the purpose of humbugging and deceiving the people.

For one I believe in making and keeping every dollar of our circulating medium, whether gold, silver, or paper, equal with every other dollar in purchasing and debt-paying power. I am unalterably opposed to a depreciated circulating medium, but I am still more opposed to an abnormally appreciated dollar, which will abnormally depress the price of all commodities.

NO HOPE FOR AN INTERNATIONAL MONETARY AGREEMENT.

All seem to agree that bimetallism would be a good thing if it could be brought about by international agreement; but there is not a Senator in this Chamber who has thoroughly studied this subject, and who fully understands the history of the several international monetary conferences that we have had in the last thirty years, that does not know that such a consummation is just as impossible—that is to say, one that will include Great Britain, and so long as that power stands back, neither Germany, nor France, nor Russia, nor any other of the great powers will come in—as it is to expect that we will secure, either now or hereafter, railroad connection between here and the planet Mars.

Most certainly so long as the United States defers, as we are now doing, to the wishes, the interests, and the dictates of Great Britain there is no possible show. If any one thing will tend to aid in bringing about such international agreement, it will be, in my judgment, a bold, aggressive, independent monetary, as well as commercial, policy upon our part. We must cease to concede that, for any reason or for all reasons combined, London must forever be the clearing house of the world. Our policy should cease to be one of dependence for any purpose or to any extent either upon Great Britain or any other power on earth. Our country is resourceful enough in all that tends to constitute commercial and monetary power and nationality in the highest, most enlarged, and best sense of the term to justify a vigorous, uncompromising, and independent monetary, as well as commercial, policy. For these reasons, briefly stated, I am not in favor of waiting longer on Great Britain, but am in favor of a vigorous, aggressive policy of independent bimetallism, coupled with a protective tariff.

I have no disposition to quarrel with those who differ with me on these great questions. I am willing to accord and do accord honesty of purpose to all. I am not of those, moreover, who believe that any cause can be advanced or strengthened or in any manner helped by the application of terms of ridicule, reproach, or abuse. Neither the cry of "crazy silverite" nor "Wall-street gold bug" can be regarded as argument, or should they have any influence in the determination of these great questions, nor do I believe that either cause will be in any manner advanced by the application of epithets to those with whom we disagree.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the great remedies to be applied to present conditions in this country are—

First. Independent bimetallism;

Second. A protective tariff; and Third. Legislation in the interest of our merchant marine that will tend to bring to us a greater proportion of our carrying trade.

What should be avoided in the future, in my judgment, is a further issuance of bonds, any increase of our national indebtedness, or further attempts to carry on the business of this great country on the basis of the single gold standard.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, Mr. President, is it not about time this great nation, these United States of America, should assert its monetary, as well as its commercial, independence? Are we, with our vast territory, our immeasurable resources, our model government, our 70,000,000 of brave, intelligent, aggressive, independent people, to forever acknowledge our dependence on Great Britain, or any other power on earth, in either a monetary or any other sense? Must we, while denying the right of any government on the globe, republican or monarchical, liberal or despotic, to dictate to us as to the character of our legislation upon any or all of the great questions touching our industrial and commercial interests, questions involving the right of expatriation, the character of people we shall admit to our shores, the encroachment of alien systems, even to limits far beyond our national borders, but upon the hemisphere upon which we live, questions involving our national honor, and every conceivable subject pertaining to our present and future welfare, and the promotion and progress of our civilization, save and except one—that relating to our monetary system—and as to that one must we be forever subservient to the will, and the wish, and the dictation of Great Britain?

Has the more than century of our national life, with all the prestige, and influence, and power, and glory that have come to us in our unparalleled progress as a nation, and in the development of a civilization than which none so grand has ever existed since the creation of man, still left us a poor, weak dependent of the British Crown? Because England, since 1816, has adhered to the single gold standard in the interest of the gold brokers of Lombard street, are we to forever bend the supple knee, acknowledge our impotency as a nation, and surrender the prerogatives that ought rightfully to attach to a free and independent people? In my judgment, the United States as a nation, in whatever aspect considered—whether nationally, intellectually, scientifically, commercially, or financially—stands, or at least should stand, in the very vanguard of nations, preeminent in every element of greatness, in every aspect of grandeur, in every attribute of glory, and in every essential of sovereign power. Resourceful in physical elements of every conceivable character, in a measure, and to an extent unparalleled by any country on the globe, if she will but assert herself as becomes her as the proud, aggressive, independent leader of nations, New York, and not London, will become the clearing house of the world, and our country, preeminent over all, will no longer be the slave, either in a commercial or monetary sense, but the distinctive and primal sovereign, the imperial master and dictator, financially as well as commercially, among all the nations of the world.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, at this late hour I have no desire to trespass upon the Senate more than a few minutes, and this I do more in the way of an explanation of the vote I shall cast upon the pending measure than an attempt to make any extended remarks.

My views were well known both before and after my election. I should have contented myself by remaining silent and casting my vote in favor of this measure had it not been for the peculiar attitude taken by one of the great metropolitan journals of the country, wherein it charged in its editorial columns and reiterated the charge day after day that the Senators upon this floor from a number of States in the Union, especially from States in the South and West, were misrepresenting their constituents; that those whom they had honored by sending them here to represent them were misrepresenting them upon this floor. Among the States thus named was California, which I have the honor in part to represent in this body. The names of my distinguished colleague and myself were mentioned as misrepresenting our people. It was stated that the sentiment of California was in favor of the single standard of gold and not in favor of the free coinage of silver, and therefore if we advocated and voted for this measure we would violate our trust and the confidence placed in us.

If this charge is correct, it is a most heinous offense; one that should justly subject us to the criticism of that great journal and condemn us to the censure of every law-abiding and patriotic citizen. I know of no crime more offensive than that of dishonor, and there can be no act more dishonorable than willfully and knowingly to misrepresent the people who have honored a man by selecting him as one of their representatives.

But how are we to know what is the public sentiment upon this question? The Republican party in California met in convention over a year ago. It was the largest convention in numbers that had been held in California for many years. Every voting precinct in every county of that State was represented in that convention, and in the platform adopted there was embodied a plank which pledged their representatives in the legislature which was to select the Senators to vote for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. That platform went before the people and every one upon the ticket was elected except the governor, who was defeated by local causes. A majority of the members of that legislature were Republicans, and I owe the honor of holding this position to their votes. While that legislature was in session it passed the following joint resolution, which I presented here some time since and will now read again, with your permission:

California assembly joint resolution No. 13.

Introduced by committee on Federal relations February 6, 1895. Read, adopted, and transmitted to senate (and by them concurred in).

Assembly substitute for senate joint resolution No. 2, relative to the free coinage of silver.

Whereas we recognize the fact that by the demonetization of silver, and by refusal to give it equal standing in the coinage system of the United States, the material interest of the nation is dangerously impaired; and

Whereas it is recognized to be a fact that the opposition to silver coinage emanates from speculative syndicates and moneyed classes, who seek to embarrass the people of the nation for the advancement of their own selfish ends; and

Whereas we entertain the firm belief that the full measure of national prosperity will never be restored until the coinage of silver is resumed in accordance with the true intent and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and having unbounded faith in the power and ability of this nation to restore and maintain silver in its proper position alongside of gold; and

Whereas we believe that the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of maintaining a single gold standard, or any standard that does not contemplate the free and unlimited coinage of silver, is a practice fraught with the greatest danger to the stability of our institutions and the maintenance of national credit: Therefore

Be it resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to earnestly and urgently advocate the immediate enactment of such laws as may be necessary to provide for the immediate resumption of the free and unlimited coinage of silver in the ratio of 16 to 1; and

Be it further resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to actively advocate the enactment of such laws as may be necessary to prevent the issue of United States bonds for the sole purpose of maintaining a single gold standard of money; and

Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to immediately transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. President, that was the last expression on this question by the legislature of California. I am a member of the State Board of Trade, of the Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, of agricultural and horticultural societies, and various other organizations, which number among their membership tens of thousands of people in our State—merchants, manufacturers, farmers, artisans, and workingmen—and since I have been here I have yet to receive a single official communication from any one of those organizations that would indicate that there has been a change in the sentiment of our people upon this question; and I think my colleague will bear the same testimony. Neither have I received a single letter which indicates that my associates in business, my associates socially, or otherwise, have changed their views, nor has the public press of our State in the cities, the towns, and the rural districts given expression to any sentiment contrary to that which has been promulgated in the years and months gone by upon this question.

The people of our State are a cosmopolitan people. They are made up from every State and Territory of the Union. They are intelligent, scholarly, thoughtful people; and when they make up their minds upon a certain political policy they want to carry out that policy before changing their minds upon it. They want to see if it has any merit in it; they want to give it a trial. They have discussed this question pro and con; they have duly considered it; and they believe that the demonetization, the retirement, so to speak, of half of the money of this country, was not in the interest of the people; that it was not in the interest of the progress of this country. My own particular views, perhaps, are more conservative, but I am here to carry out the instructions of the people whose good opinion I so much desire. I am here to reflect the wishes of the people to whom I owe so much. If the charges in the paper to which I have referred were true, to the effect that I am knowingly misrepresenting them upon this floor, my resignation would be placed at their disposal. But it is not true that my colleague and myself are not representing their wishes upon this floor, unless that great journal has some information that our people know nothing about.

As I was proceeding to say, my own personal views are conservative upon this question. If I could enact a law I would do that which was embodied in my amendment at the last Congress, when we had under consideration the repeal of the Sherman Act. It was the free and unlimited coinage of American silver, the withdrawal from circulation of all bills under $10, and to cease the coinage of all gold under $5. It was to let the American miner take the product of our American silver mines to the mint, and there have it coined into silver dollars or the denominational part thereof, I believed that such a policy would be productive of more good than to open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver that came from Mexico, where skilled miners received but 50 cents a day, and the ordinary laborer but 25 cents a day.

I believe in first fostering the silver of our own country, opening our own mines, giving employment to our own miners, finding work for the American mechanics who would build the machines, and the pumps, and the machinery to run those mines, furnishing a home market for the product of the farmer, stimulating American industry, and carrying out on that line what I believe to be true Republicanism; that is, first to take care of our own country before sending missionaries to the South Sea Islands. I never did have any patience, even at home, with those good people who sew and make clothing and send supplies to the heathen while their neighbor's children are going barefoot and half clad. So I would have this American policy, if I had my way, on the silver question.

Some say that such a policy is not practicable, because they would smuggle in foreign silver; that they would set up a mint in Mexico and there coin our American dollars and half dollars, not putting in less silver, but putting in the same silver we now have, weighing just as many grains, and bring them in and scatter them among our people. Well, people now smuggle into this country; men now violate the law, both State and national; and once in a while we have an opportunity of making an example of them and letting them feel the penalty of the law.

But there are two sides to this question. No one can deny it who has sat in this Chamber as we have done for the last month and listened to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and then turning to the other side has listened to the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], then the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and then the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], all men of great learning, men who have devoted their lives to the study of political economy. Many of them have been on this floor for a generation, for a period longer than the lives of some who now occupy seats here. Yet they are a long way apart. Both sides can not be right. They are like two parallel lines; if they continue on that course they will never meet. It seems to me that each side should concede something; that there should be some compromise measure. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], shakes his head. He says "no compromise." He is like the old woman in the story when talking to her friends in the church—everybody was wrong except herself, and she did not understand how it could be. Mr. President, there are two sides to every question.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Every time we have traded with the other fellows we have got cheated. They called it a compromise, but they got the whole thing. They will not keep faith, and there is no use to try it again. I am for no more compromises with the enemy.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, two wrongs never made a right. There is not to-day upon our statute book a law that is not a measure of compromise. It is the highest attribute of the American that a citizen of this great Republic can have an opportunity to discuss this proposition and that proposition and after discussion to agree.

Mr. STEWART. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly not.

Mr. STEWART. Was the act of 1873 or the act repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and adopting the gold standard, with a view of immediate prosperity, a compromise?

Mr. PERKINS. My friend, the Senator from Nevada, was here at the time and I was not. He can answer that question better than I.

Mr. STEWART. You have read the law. Was that a compromise?

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator permitted it to pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is said he voted for it.

Mr. STEWART. That I voted for what measure?

Mr. PERKINS. I did not say so. Some of your friends here say so.

Mr. STEWART. I did not; and no man honestly believes that I would vote for either of those acts.

Mr. PERKINS. At all events, the law was repealed. If it could have been continued I believe there would not have been now the great divergence between the two metals. I believe in bimetallism. I believe in the use of both gold and silver. I think we ought to have some compromise. Here is our new Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who has offered two amendments. One before me closes up with a doxology which sounds splendidly. He puts back of every gold dollar a silver dollar, and back of every silver dollar a gold dollar.

Mr. PEFFER. Is not that right?

Mr. PERKINS. If that could be done it certainly seems to me to be worthy of consideration. He has also proposed the coinage of American silver. We are now producing about 60,000,000 ounces of silver per annum in the United States. Let us withdraw from circulation all one, two, and five dollar bills, and the silver would then go out in change among our people. There is no germ of disease in the silver dollar or the silver half dollar, but when you take a currency bill that has been in the pocket of some thrifty immigrant for three months it ought to be fumigated before being taken into the family and given to the children to play with.

I believe, Mr. President, that there can be some compromise measure agreed upon. I believe, in the true spirit of statesmanship, we should take up the amendments offered by the Senator from Kansas and consider them in a spirit of fairness, in a spirit of justice, in a spirit of patriotism, for after all we all have in view the same object. We want a good government; we want wise laws; we want to do that which will make our people contented and happy and prosperous. What is the object of a government unless it has that in view? What does this great Congress mean, if we come here month after month and year after year and discuss this proposition and that proposition and no one will concede to the other that he is half right, and the other side will not concede to this side that it is half right? Mr. President, that is not the spirit which should animate us. Let us come together on these propositions and out of it crystallize something that will benefit our people. The times are sadly out of joint. I do not believe it is all because our mints are not open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. I believe there are other great wrongs that should be remedied.

Mr. STEWART. Will I interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States, acting independently of any other nation?

Mr. PERKINS. I shall vote for that measure, because before the Senator came upon the floor I said that the people I in part represent here instructed me to do so; but I very much question if it is the wisest policy for us to pursue at this time. I want to reiterate what I have said. Understanding the wishes of my people, I should be false to them if I pursued any other course. There is no question in my mind but that my path of duty is as clear as the midday sun. But I am discussing the other proposition, one to which my distinguished friend has given much thought. He is a student of political economy, and he knows as well as I do that when we open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver the wages of the miners in the mines in Mexico, that are being worked to-day by miners for 50 cents a day in silver, and who live upon food that costs them not to exceed 10 cents, will go up to American wages or the mine owner will profit by it. I said before the Senator came in that I believe in first taking care of our own people.

Mr. STEWART. Does not the Senator know that our mines are pretty much all closed down?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, and I want to open them.

Mr. STEWART. Would you keep them closed for fear somebody else will be benefited? Why not close the gold mines, why not demonetize the gold, because the people of the world who are engaged in that business are benefited by having our gold?

Mr. PERKINS. My friend misunderstands me. It is my belief that it is wise statesmanship to open the mints of the United States to the production of silver from American mines. That would set to work all your mines in Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, Idaho, Montana, and elsewhere. It would find a market for the products of the farm; it would give employment to the mechanic who builds the machinery, to the quartz mills, and the engines that are used in running the mines; it would give employment to the teamster and to a hundred grades of artisans connected with mining.

Mr. STEWART. Would that limited use of silver have any effect upon the four thousand million dollars of silver now in existence?

Mr. PERKINS. It would be taking one step. We would commence the reform at home. It would be notice to the world——

Mr. STEWART. Would that limited use of it be any different from buying silver?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it would.

Mr. STEWART. Would it rehabilitate silver so as to relieve the prices?

Mr. PERKINS. It would do so in the United States.

Mr. STEWART. But our difficulty is that we have to sell our farm products in competition with the millions of producers in Asia, and on account of the low price of silver they have an advantage of 100 per cent, while our farmers are ruined. Does not the Senator see that the policy of coining the American product would be the same as the policy of buying? It does not remonetize silver and does not help the farmer by furnishing more money for his farm products.

Mr. PERKINS. Without discussing that proposition in detail, I will say that it is hardly clear to me how it would benefit us by opening our mints to the coinage of Mexican silver; while if we open our mints to the coinage of American silver it would be notice to the world that we had taken one step in advance and that perhaps later on we would open our mints to the product of the world.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator know of a single gold man in this Chamber who is willing to do that? Has he made one convert? Is it not a fact that when President Harrison made his swing around the circle through Utah and the Western part of the country immediately in his wake a large number of our silver men said they were going to accept that as a compromise? I told them before they accepted it as a compromise to find the gold man in the East who would offer to compromise. Before we compromise would it not be well to find one regular gold man in the United States who is willing to compromise?

Mr. PERKINS. Even Cromwell made no converts to his faith by going with a Bible in one hand and a sword in the other. It is much better to take the olive branch.

Mr. STEWART. Did you ever know a Christian to make any progress in compromising with the devil? It is just as absurd to talk about an honest silver man compromising with the gold bugs.

Mr. PERKINS. I know a great many Christians, but I am not acquainted with any of the other class.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator think they would be hard to find?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know; I have been keeping good company in Washington.

Mr. President, as I was saying, something is certainly wrong in our financial affairs. During the three years the present Administration has been in control we have run behind $262,000,000, or we will have done so on the 5th of February, when the next bond bid is opened; and this, too, in a time of peace, when there have been no great internal improvements, no great harbor and river improvements, no fortifications on either the Atlantic or the Pacific; and while there has been some addition in our Navy, nothing like there should have been. We have been running behind to this extent, which means to the people, at 4 per cent, $10,480,000 a year, $840,000 per month in interest money, which they must pay out because by our poor business management we have not had sufficient income to pay the running expenses of the Government. I do not echo the sentiment of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that this has been brought about by dishonesty, but I do know that it has been brought about by mismanagement, by bad business judgment, and we ought to right this wrong in some way.

The measure that came from the House of Representatives and went to the Committee on Finance, known as the bond bill, has now been amended and returned to the Senate, and that is under consideration. I rose for the purpose of saying that I shall vote for the amendment. After I have done that I will have discharged my duty so far as it is possible for me to do so upon this question. I do not think it would be patriotic on my part or in the interests of the people of this country to vote for amendments that are only calculated to obstruct legislation when proposed to other measures, like the tariff bill. I believe it our patriotic duty to provide a revenue for the support of the Government, and the revenue bill presented to us by the House of Representatives seems the most expedient plan now left for us to adopt. I know of no other measure to increase the revenue unless we amend the tariff bill so as to add to the amount it will bring in per annum. It is said by those who have made a careful estimate that the bill as passed by the other House will bring in $40,000,000 per annum in addition to the present tariff act known as the Wilson-Gorman bill. If it does it will help bridge over our affairs until there is some change in the business management of the Government.

The bond bill would, perhaps, have received favorable action at the hands of the Finance Committee had it not been that before they were called upon to consider it a call was made for the sale of $100,000,000 4 per cent bonds under the existing law. It has been charged, and not successfully denied, that a syndicate had been formed for the purpose of taking the full issue, and that there was an agreement or tacit understanding that the bonds would be placed on the same terms and price as those previously sold. We must, however, accept the declaration of the Administration and the letter of the manager, if not of the original author, of the syndicate that it was formed from purely patriotic motives.

While I do not for a moment question their purely patriotic motives, and do not wish to be understood as questioning the personal patriotism of those who were interested in the syndicate, I claim that it is an unusual occurrence when in times of peace shrewd and prudent business men form a gigantic syndicate controlling $100,000,000 without some assurance that it will be required and used for their mutual benefit. That a syndicate was formed, or it could not have been dissolved, all admit. I am willing to concede that the syndicate was dissolved because its members saw no opportunity of adding any luster to their patriotic laurels at this time.

There are not many kind words said in behalf of the Administration now, but I want to commend it in passing, in a measure only, for making the bond sale a popular one, so to speak. It was done in answer to an almost universal demand of popular sentiment. It demonstrates in a way that can not be mistaken that there is no man in this country who can raise himself above the popular will of the people. It is popular sentiment which governs. No man in this country is big enough or great enough to wrap around himself the robes of his own self-righteousness and self-knowledge and say, "I am the people." No, it is the whole people, and the people only, who rule in this Government; and when the time comes that they do not rule, when the time comes that public sentiment does not govern this land and bring those in the highest position down to representing the views of the people, then a republican form of government will have become a failure.

But it seems to me, while it was made a popular loan or a popular bond offer to our people, the way would have been to fix a definite price for the bonds, so that thay would pay the purchaser the equivalent of, say, 3 per cent per annum, first giving the proposals to the different States in the order in which the Constitution provides for direct taxation, and after this had been done to distribute the remainder in the order of the applications; or the call should provide that on the deposit of the gold at any post-office or subtreasury for transmission to the Treasury a receipt should be given stating the amount of bonds to be delivered in the denominations the depositor desired.

There is one other proposition of this bond call which has rested very unpleasantly upon my mind and which I have been unable to understand; that is, why, as to all cities west of the Missouri River, there is no provision made where these bonds can be taken, except in San Francisco, and in San Francisco the subscribers must pay the cost of exchange on New York. In Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, Philadelphia, and Boston they can go to the subtreasurer's office, deposit their gold, and receive the bonds, but the people of no city in any other State west of the Missouri River can deposit their gold in any of the post-offices or subtreasuries of the Government without paying the difference of exchange between San Francisco and New York. It is a matter of fact that this Government is paying out thousands and thousands of dollars annually for the transportation of coin from the Pacific Coast to New York every year. Why should this discrimination be made against us in the West? Can it be that it is desired to punish California because she has been so loyal and patriotic in the past, because she has produced so much gold and poured it into the Treasury of this Government, because she has collected so much of custom-house and excise duties? Is it to punish her for doing this that they are discriminating against us poor orphans on the western shore of this great continent?

Let me tell you what we have done in the way of producing the gold for which we are now receiving our punishment. We produced in 1895 $15,600,000. I am not jealous of any State of the Union only to emulate it; but Colorado did a little better than that this last year. She could not, however, buy bonds with that gold, unless she took the money by express to Chicago or to St. Louis or to San Francisco, and there paid the cost of exchange between San Francisco and New York.

California has produced since 1848 in gold $1,354,566,000. Last year the San Francisco mint coined $25,547,610. California has also paid to the United States for the thirty-three years ending June 30, 1895, in customs duties the enormous sum of $217,631,836.73, and in internal-revenue collections for the thirty-three years ending June 30, 1895, she paid $88,214,905.64, making a total collected in thirty-three years of $305,846,742.37.

This is indeed a splendid financial showing. Her people have ever been true and loyal to this country. We have a State pride, which is commendable in every one. We glory in her magnificent hills, clad in the emerald verdure which seems to almost support the blue arch of heaven. We glory in her magnificent valleys, which produce wheat sufficient to load a half dozen ships a day during the year. We are proud of her magnificent institutions of learning, proud of her people, who, as I have said, for their loyalty and devotion to this country are second to those of no other State in the Union. But, above all, we are loyal to the Central Government, because it is a representative Government.

This Senate and this Capitol of the nation reflect the patriotism of the country, and we shall not be true to ourselves and not true to the people unless we honestly and faithfully represent them. Therefore I believe I am doing right when I charge that this Government has not treated us fairly or justly by making a discrimination against us, especially as she is paying out this money to express companies to transport this coin from the Pacific Coast to New York.

Our people in California are proud of their commercial honor as merchants. During the war, while we had the specific contract act providing for gold payments, and though three-fourths of them could have been paid in the currency of the country, there was scarcely an exception throughout that State where men who discharged their indebtedness did not do so in gold, which was understood to be the contract at the time the debt was incurred. But notwithstanding this discrimination against us, notwithstanding these bonds have been offered in such a way that our people will not respond as they otherwise would have done, I believe when the bids are opened on next Wednesday, the 5th of February, that applications will be on file to take every bond at a much higher premium than 4½ per cent, and all that the Government gets above that 4½ per cent will be saved to the people of this country.

All that this Government receives for those bonds in advance of that, we may assume without doing violence to our conscience, it could have got one year ago last February, had the same appeal been made to our people, and there would not have been one word of adverse criticism against this Administration if a call had first been made inviting the people to take these bonds. If they had failed to do so, any contract which would have been made would have been ratified by the people. The people want no representative in Congress, in the Executive chair, or any other place who will not take the people into his confidence.

We all have one great common object in view—the happiness, the success, and the prosperity of this great nation. Let each of us take this lesson home to himself—not what my neighbor does, not what my neighbor should do, but what is it my duty to do under the circumstances? Let us act, then, conscientiously, honestly, patriotically, for the best interests of the people. We shall then have the satisfaction of the approval of our own consciences, and if we make a mistake the people will know it is an error of judgment and will never blame us for it.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, perhaps at this late hour of the day it would hardly be proper to go on with the discussion, but I will take the floor with the expectation of proceeding to-morrow, and will now yield for an executive session, if any Senator desires to make the motion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have given notice that I would ask the Senate to remain in session to-day until this bill was disposed of, but being satisfied from conferences with many Senators that there will be no difficulty in getting a vote on the bill in the very near future, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, as he abandons his plan with reference to this bill, I wish to ask what is his purpose—what is his request of the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have made no request of the Senate except that I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will state frankly to the Senator, however, that I hope the Senate will take a recess at the end of the executive session until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that we may be able to remain in session to-morrow until practically the debate on the bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator why he proposes to take a recess, instead of adjourning in the usual way, until 12 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So that the regular order will come up for consideration immediately after the assembling of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. To the exclusion of the morning business?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator expect to finish the bill to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope so; but if it is not disposed of then, I hope to have it disposed of early the following day.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will that be agreeable to the Senator from New York, I should like to ask him?

Mr. HILL. I am not making any objection, and I prefer not to be polled. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I only ask these questions with a view of expediting the object which the Senator from Arkansas wishes to accomplish. Of course, we all desire to hear the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and it may possibly result in changing votes on this question. For one I am ready to agree to have the bill considered under the five-minute rule whenever the Senator from Arkansas succeeds in securing the assent of other Senators to that agreement. I only wished to know whether he had abandoned the hope of passing the bill shortly, or whether he expected to go on with its consideration to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So far from abandoning the bill, my present motion is the result of my conviction that it is the easiest way to dispose of the bill in the near future.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I wish to say that while I have not heretofore had much expectation of making any remarks upon the bill, yet I should like to occupy, say on Saturday at the earliest possible time, somewhere from forty to sixty minutes on the subject; and as I understand the floor will be occupied to-morrow by other speakers, I shall ask an opportunity to be heard on Saturday at as early an hour as I can have.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have not a doubt that there will be unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may take the floor at any time on Saturday he chooses and that he may occupy it as long as he desires.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator does not expect to finish the bill to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I had hoped to do so.

Mr. CHANDLER. But the Senator from Vermont has the same right to convince the Senators upon this floor how they should vote as has the Senator from Wisconsin, and certainly it is not intended to put the Senator from Vermont in the attitude of speaking after the bill has been disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of course not. Since the Senator from Vermont has indicated his desire, of course I shall defer to him.

Mr. STEWART. I will suggest to the Senator having charge of the bill that it is perfectly apparent that no vote can be taken on it this week, and that he postpone the time for taking the final vote.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. STEWART. There are only two days of this week left. I am very certain a vote can be had earlier by getting an agreement that it be taken early next week.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Unless the Senator from Nevada proposes to delay action on the bill, I am very certain that a vote can be had not later than Saturday.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to submit this suggestion: I think it would be wise for us to take a recess this evening until 10, 11, or 12 o'clock to-morrow, so that the unfinished business will be proceeded with as soon as the Journal shall be read after we assemble to-morrow. If we do that, and then on to-morrow evening take a recess—say, until 10 or 11 o'clock on Saturday—it will give ample time, in my opinion, for every Senator who desires to speak to be fully heard within that time. If that be true, we may come to a vote by, say, 12 o'clock on Saturday.

I feel a very deep interest in the matter for one reason only. The Senator from Arkansas is in charge of the bill, and can not very well leave here until it is disposed of; and I chance to know that it is a matter of importance to him to leave here at least on Saturday afternoon. I for one would subject myself to any amount of personal inconvenience in order to oblige that Senator or any other Senator on this floor who might be similarly situated. I hope that we may come to some such agreement as I have suggested.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am as willing to endure and suffer for the convenience of the Senator from Arkansas as is the Senator from Tennessee. The point that I was endeavoring to elucidate was whether we should advance this bill by the agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. I do not think that we shall advance it at all by taking a recess instead of an adjournment. I do not myself wish to be put in the attitude of hastening the passage of such a pernicious amendment as that which the Senator from Arkansas has reported to a very wise and important bill. On the other hand, I do not wish to delay the action of the Senate, or to cause any inconvenience to the Senator from Arkansas, whose interests in his own State need his presence there at this time. For the purpose, therefore, of solving the difficulty, and with a desire to accommodate the Senator from Arkansas and to join in the spirit of accommodation manifested by the Senator from Tennessee, with the permission of the Senator from New York, I will ask consent that this bill may be considered under the five-minute rule on Saturday, beginning at 11 o'clock and that it be finished before adjournment.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall have to object to that proposition, under the notice I have given.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg pardon. I will add to my proposition, "With the exception of any remarks the Senator from Vermont may choose to submit."

Mr. STEWART. In the suggestion I made I had no intention of delaying the passage of the bill. I should like to see it disposed of at the earliest possible moment, and do not intend to make any remarks upon it further than what I shall say now with regard to it.

I do not think the bill of any importance, certainly not to those interested in the silver question, because everybody knows that it is not to become a law.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amendment or the bill?

Mr. STEWART. The amendment. There is no test about it. Those who desire to do so can make a silver record on that without hurting anybody. It is a perfectly harmless bill; it is mere dress parade, and I shall not make any speech on it. The real bill upon which the amendment reported by the committee would be germane is the tariff bill, because there is already practically a tariff against us on the part of the silver-standard countries of 100 per cent, and when you consider the question of tariff, you must deal with that difference of exchange, or you accomplish nothing; for it is impossible to build a tariff wall high enough around this country to have any practical effect while this difference of exchange exists. Inasmuch as the amendment is germane to the tariff bill, when that bill comes up I propose to submit some remarks. The consideration of that bill will not be mere dress parade. So far as the pending bill is concerned, I am desirous of having it disposed of as early as possible. All I propose to do is to vote. I will vote on dress parade with the rest of the Senate, but I want to see how Senators will meet the real test, and show whether they are silver men or not. I want to see how many will place silver above tariff, or tariff above silver, because silver has become tariff now. That is my position, and I rose to apologize for what I said. I do not want to interfere or to delay in any way the passage of the pending bill. I want to have it passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will wait I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator why he calls this mere dress parade. Here is an amendment for the free coinage of silver for the United States alone. The Senator is very much in favor of that and he is now endeavoring to show that he is not opposing or delaying the passage of the amendment. Why does he say that it is mere dress parade to pass the pending proposition? If it is mere dress parade why should we not abandon the dress parade and go on with a bill that will fill the Treasury of the United States with money which is needed by the Treasury—that would not be dress parade—and put the money in the Treasury so as to be able to pay our debts? When the Senator says it is dress parade to pass this amendment, why not order off the troops that are on dress parade and go on with the business of the Senate?

Mr. STEWART. That is what I should be very glad to do. The Senator and everybody else knows very well that this bill was passed through the House to indorse the principle of issuing bonds to buy gold and to have Republican indorsement of the bond issue.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the Senator says I know a thing I prefer to speak for myself.

Mr. STEWART. I hope I shall be pardoned for presuming that the Senator has any knowledge of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator imagines that he has absorbed all the knowledge on the subject.

Mr. STEWART. I have apologized to the Senator for presuming that he had any knowledge on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. STEWART. Not now.

The passing of the bill through the House of Representatives, providing for the issuing of bonds, was an indorsement of the issuance of interest-bearing bonds in time of peace. So there is no difference between the two parties, between Mr. Cleveland——

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, may I ask a question?

Mr. STEWART. No, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me ask one question?

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will not get so nervous. I decline to yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. There is no difference between Mr. Cleveland's policy and the policy of the Republican party, except as to the kind of bonds and how they shall be issued. It is agreed on all hands that this bill was passed for that purpose, to show the agreement on the part of the Republican party to the policy of issuing interest-bearing bonds in time of peace to accumulate gold.

Now the Senator says let us abandon this dress parade and pass a bill to put money into the Treasury. I suppose by that he means the tariff bill. The President, having had his policy of selling bonds indorsed, has proposed to sell $100,000,000 and put the money in the Treasury. He has already got about $180,000,000 of cash balance there; and it is proposed to put another $100,000,000 there, and it is suggested that $100,000,000 additional shall be placed there, making $200,000,000. By the time that is done pretty much all the money the people depend upon with which to do business will be in the Treasury. What they complain of is this mode of impounding the money of the country by the sale of bonds. We do not care whether it is done by a Republican bond bill or by Mr. Cleveland without law. We are opposed to the policy of impounding the money.

The tariff bill, if it brings any money into the Treasury, will only aggravate the disease. What are people going to do during the next year if you have $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 locked up in the Treasury? There ought to be some way of getting the money out of the Treasury, so that the people can have it.

There is no excuse for a tariff bill. What is the good of a tariff bill which will last for a year? Nobody can go into business on that. It is styled an emergency tariff bill. Whoever heard of an emergency tariff bill? We have heard on the stump from time immemorial the plea that the tariff should be fixed, so that business might be regulated accordingly and the tariff should not disturb business; but here is a regular business disturber. What for? If it is to put more money into the Treasury, it is to aggravate the evil of locking up the people's money. For what purpose is it? It is certainly for the purpose of manufacturing a false issue. It is certainly for the purpose of having tariff agitation without tariff legislation. That is all that is wanted—tariff agitation without tariff legislation. What good will a temporary bill of this kind do? If it does anything it will bring more money into the Treasury, and that will aggravate the evil of contraction. If as a permanent law it would benefit business, as a temporary measure it will disturb business. Why do you want to keep business unsettled by temporary expedients of this kind?

But if you put on the tariff bill a free-coinage measure such as is reported by the committee to the pending bill, you will relieve us from Asiatic competition with a hundred per cent advantage in the difference of exchange. Then you do some good for the people. You may have as many tariff bills as you please; but while the difference in exchange remains where it is everything produced in this country that comes into competition with Asia will have to continue to go down. Under Asiatic competition your wheat and your cotton have gone down below the cost of production. Your wool has gone down in the same way, because the wool-producing countries are all on the silver standard. You may put on as many tariffs as you will; but the prices of all articles that are in competition with Asiatic productions will have to go down.

It has come to a point where the prices of manufactured articles have to go down. They came last because it took some time to establish manufactories in the Orient, but they are being established now on a most gigantic scale, so much so that it makes a boom in all Europe to manufacture machinery for them. The Europeans have to manufacture only one machine of a given kind for one city, and after that the Asiatics can duplicate the machines without limit.

Now I say that so far as the tariff bill is concerned it is simply maneuvering for an issue. So far as the pending bill is concerned, it is the same thing. It is simply to give the assent of a Republican Congress to the issue of interest-bearing bonds to increase the public debt in time of peace. That is all it amounts to. Everybody knew it before the bill was introduced. Before the bill was introduced arrangements were made for the sale of the kind of bonds that the syndicate wants. Four per cent bonds suit them better.

If 4 per cent bonds can be sold so as to yield the same rate of interest, what difference does it make how the country is loaded with debt and the currency is taken up and impounded from the people? Whether done under one system or the other, let it be known that both of the old parties are in favor of the issuance of bonds for the purpose of buying gold on which the Administration is to-day paying a premium of 20 per cent. The Government has come in and is paying a premium of 20 per cent on gold. How is that?

Before Mr. Cleveland commenced to improve the public credit a 4 per cent bond running eighteen years sold at from 25 to 27 per cent premium. After he had been at work a little over a year the same character of bonds, 4 per cent bonds running thirty years, sold for 4½, a difference of over 20 per cent. The President told us in his message that if we would provide for the sale of gold bonds he could save $16,000,000 on the $62,000,000 of bonds; that the same syndicate would give $16,000,000 more for them if they were gold bonds. He sold the bonds and they were not gold bonds, and in that sale he paid a premium of more than 20 per cent, according to his own showing, because they were not gold bonds. Now, the Government is maintaining the gold standard and is paying a premium of at least 20 per cent; and that premium will grow as time goes on. How long shall we stand buying gold and paying a premium on it? The price of property has to go down in competition with the price of bonds which the Government sells to buy gold.

I am opposed in toto to the policy of incurring a debt in time of peace in order to buy gold for gold gamblers when the law allows us and makes it our duty to pay them, according to contract, in silver. I am opposed to it first, last, and all the time. Nobody expects the bond bill to become a law if it passes this body. It is not the kind of a bill that the Rothschilds want. Four per cent thirty-year bonds are just the kind of bonds that suit them best, and if the policy of selling out the country is to go on I would as lief they would sell that class of bonds as any other, because if we maintain the gold standard for the sale of bonds the country will be loaded down until the ship sinks; it can not go any further. The idea of a perpetual increase of the public debt, buying gold at a premium to give gold gamblers an opportunity to make money, when you have not contracted to do it! Why should not the United States avail herself of the option the same as France and Germany do and pay silver, according to contract, and not pay a premium on gold?

I am opposed to the whole policy; but if we are to have tariff legislation let us have effective tariff legislation. Let us remove the advantage that the Asiatics have over us. Let our farmers compete with Asiatics on equal terms. Our farmers sell their cotton and wheat in competition with the Asiatics with the disadvantage that the difference in exchange causes, which is now a hundred per cent. You do not propose to remedy that at all, and you do not even propose to take care of your manufacturers. The time has come when this competition is going to reach you; in fact, it is reaching you now, and in a few short years you will share the same fate that the farmers have met. When the millions of Asiatics get their manufacturing establishments in full operation they will manufacture for the world, with the difference of exchange in their favor, as they are now producing wheat and cotton for the world.

If there is to be any good-faith tariff legislation, let us have it. Let a free-coinage amendment be put upon the tariff bill. That would be the test of good faith as to whether or not you are in favor of taking care of American industries. That would be the test whether or not you are silver men. The bond bill will never become a law; it will never be voted on in the other House. It will be buried in the committee; it will be treated with contempt.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Nevada says this is simply dress parade; and he proposes to link the silver question with the tariff. In arguing the question, he says everybody knows that the pending bill can not become a law. I desire to ask the Senator whether he thinks the tariff bill with a silver amendment can become a law?

Mr. STEWART. Of course it can not become a law, with or without a silver amendment, and everybody knows it. There is no intention that it shall become a law. It will be vetoed at the other end of the Avenue. It is simply to make an issue; it is merely to have Mr. Cleveland veto it and be fighting about nothing. The object is to have an issue in order to bury the silver question. I do not want it buried under any such sham issue. It would be bad enough to bury it under a real tariff controversy, but to bury it under a sham issue, a buncombe issue made on purpose to be vetoed by Mr. Cleveland, so that they can have that——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

Mr. STEWART. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senator whether, if it is his view that a free-coinage measure should be added to the tariff bill, he will not join with us in voting down the amendment which is proposed to the pending bill?

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator from New Hampshire want to make me step out of the ranks on dress parade?

Mr. CHANDLER. The question is a fair one, and the Senator is in a frame of mind to answer it lucidly, if not at length.

Mr. STEWART. My frame of mind——

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is now advocating the amendment proposed to the pending bill, and he has gone on to advocate such an amendment to another bill, the tariff bill, which is to come by and by.

Mr. STEWART. Now put your question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator whether he will not consent to vote down the amendment reported to this bill and confine his efforts to putting such an amendment on the tariff bill? In other words—I will put the question in another form—is the Senator from Nevada in favor of putting a free-coinage amendment upon every bill that is proposed in the Senate?

Mr. STEWART. I am certainly in favor of putting such an amendment on every buncombe bill that you propose. To every bill that is for pure buncombe I would propose a free-coinage amendment. We know we can not secure the enactment of a free-coinage law; that the President will veto such a measure. So to let you play buncombe while I keep quiet, it seems to me, is turkey on your side all the time.

Mr. CHANDLER. When does the Senator from Nevada keep quiet?

Mr. STEWART. I have very little time to do anything but keep quiet when there are so many other Senators talking.

Mr. HILL and others. Question!

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the Chair state the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; but I desire to say a few words. I withdraw the request with the understanding that Saturday an effort is to be made not only by the friends of the amendment, but by its opponents, to secure action upon the amendment and the bill before the Senate adjourns on that day. I think the public interests will be subserved by disposing of the bill at the earliest possible moment, although I am utterly opposed to the amendment the Senator from Arkansas advocates with such earnestness and infelicity.

Mr. FAULKNER and others. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, when, on motion of Mr. JONES of Arkansas, the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 31, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to reserve all points of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, whether it is necessary, on an appropriation bill, when the report is presented, to reserve all points of order, and whether such points can not be made as to new legislation in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be willing to hear argument; but the impression of the Chair is that if the House commits a bill to the committee without points of order being reserved, the effect will be that the committee can not disregard the orders of the House to consider that bill in its entirety; but when points of order are reserved, then advantage can be taken of them in the Committee of the Whole.

KANSAS CITY, PITTSBURG AND GULF RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2285) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. The Clerk is reading the original bill. The committee reported the Senate bill as a substitute, and I ask that the Senate bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute.

Senate bill No. 1046, on the same subject, was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on giving unanimous consent. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Is it for unanimous consent to consider a Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any House report?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; there is a House report.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to cut off consideration if the committee in charge is ready for consideration; but it seems to me it is that class of a bill that ought to be considered, and I suppose it could be done, in Committee of the Whole, where there can be amendment and full explanation.

Mr. LITTLE. The bill is not an extensive bill. It only provides for the construction of a branch road about 25 miles in length, on the Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad, in the Indian country. This is a unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill has passed the Senate and we report the Senate bill as a substitute.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is subject to the point of order that it should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House, not having been considered.

Mr. GROUT. Are the bills identical?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir. I have reported the Senate bill. There is no objection on the part of the Interior Department.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I object.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—DAVIS VS. CULBERSON.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 3, presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Elections No. 3, to which was referred the contested election case of J. H. Davis against D. B. Culberson, from the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Texas, respectfully submits the following report:

The record in this case consists of the notice of contest, the answer and affidavit of David B. Culberson, all of which were filed by the contestee. Since the filing of the notice of contest, the contestant appears to have done nothing in prosecuting his claim to the seat. He has not produced any testimony, and, although twice notified by letter directed to his place of residence, he has not appeared before the committee.

The committee does not believe that in view of these facts the right of the sitting member to his seat should longer remain in question, and therefore recommends to the House the adoption of the following resolutions, to wit:

Resolved, That J. H. Davis was not elected a Representative from the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Texas to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That David B. Culberson was duly elected a Representative from the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Texas to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolutions read to the House.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—ROSENTHAL VS. CROWLEY.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of Rosenthal vs. Crowley, and I give notice that I will call up the case to-morrow morning for consideration. I ask that the report be printed. Inasmuch as the report is unanimous, the contestant has asked the committee to request a favor of the House, and I ask that Mr. Rosenthal, the contestant, be allowed one hour to-morrow morning to present his views of the case to the House. That is his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, presents a report in the contested-election case of Rosenthal vs. Crowley, gives notice that he will ask for the consideration of it to-morrow morning, and asks consent that the contestant, Mr. Rosenthal, be heard for one hour by the House. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, is the party who asks to be heard the one in whose favor the report is made, or the other?

The SPEAKER. He is the gentleman against whom the report is made. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, presented the following report:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives, at his earliest convenience, the report of the board of engineers appointed by him to investigate and report upon the route and other subjects connected with the Nicaragua Canal.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution, report that the full committee have had under consideration the resolution, to wit: That the President of the United States be requested, and he is hereby requested, to furnish the House of Representatives at his earliest convenience the report of the board of engineers appointed by him to investigate and report upon the route and other subjects connected with the Nicaraguan Canal, and it is unanimously recommended by said committee that said resolution do pass.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington desire to be heard?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not unless there is objection to the resolution.

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

FORT OMAHA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, which I send to the desk, to provide for the transfer of Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, when Fort Crook, near the city of Omaha, Nebr., is ready for occupancy by the troops of the Army of the United States, to transfer and turn over to the State of Nebraska the Fort Omaha Military Reservation, containing about 80 acres, with all the buildings, appurtenances, and improvements thereof; the said reservation being the same tracts and parcels of land heretofore donated to the United States by the citizens of Omaha, Nebr. The purpose of said transfer is that the said Fort Omaha Military Reservation shall be used by the said State of Nebraska as a place of rendezvous and school of instruction for the National Guard of said State of Nebraska and is made conditional upon its use for that purpose, and that the adjutant-general of said State shall annually report to the Secretary of War in detail the uses of said reservation. The said State of Nebraska is privileged to establish on said reservation a State military school, with not less than two military instructors.

SEC. 2. That the said reservation, while used for the purposes aforesaid, to be maintained without expense to the United States, and at any time that, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the military necessities of the United States shall require such action, he shall take possession of said military reservation for the use of the Government.

Amendments were recommended by the committee, as follows:

Section 1, line 7, insert "possession of" before "Fort Omaha Military Reservation."

Section 2, line 4, strike out "military necessities" and insert "interests."

Section 2, line 7, after "Government," insert "together with all the buildings, appurtenances, and improvements thereon."

Add the following as "Section 3":

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the said State of Nebraska while in the possession of such military reservation to keep all permanent buildings and improvements on such reservation in as good condition and repair as at the date it shall enter into the possession thereof, and the same shall be inspected at least once in each year by an officer of the Army, who shall report the condition of such improvements to the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska for the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether it grants anything more than the use of the reservation, whether it passes any title?

Mr. MERCER. It does not pass any title, for the reason that the title, as I understand it, is in such condition that we could not word a bill to that effect with safety. This reservation was donated to the United States Government by citizens of Omaha in years gone by, but now the Government proposes to vacate the reservation as a military post, and this bill is so worded that the United States retains its title and merely allows to the State of Nebraska the use of the reservation.

Mr. PERKINS. Without expense to the Government?

Mr. MERCER. Without expense to the Government.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that it goes further than that; it requires the State to keep the buildings in good repair and reserves to the General Government the right to resume possession at any time.

Mr. MERCER. The chairman of the committee is correct in that statement.

Mr. CANNON. Whereabouts is this military reservation with reference to the city of Omaha?

Mr. MERCER. It is within the limits of the city.

Mr. CANNON. How does it happen that the Government has no use for it?

Mr. MERCER. Because the Government intends vacating it next spring, as the Secretary of War states in his report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOWARD. I object. [After a pause.] I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is House bill No. 162, relating to pensions.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Alabama has withdrawn his objection.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has called for the regular order, which is a renewal of his objection. The previous question having been ordered upon the pending bill, the question before the House is on the motion to recommit it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the previous question be considered as vacated.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment that I offered on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The first thing to be withdrawn, or otherwise disposed of, is the motion to recommit.

Mr. PICKLER. I object to that being withdrawn.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the bill.

The SPEAKER. It can not be offered while a motion to recommit is pending. That motion must first be voted down.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The question was again taken; and there were—ayes 14, noes 79.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that there is no quorum present?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER (after counting). There are 193 gentlemen present, a quorum. The noes have it, and the motion to recommit is lost.

Mr. POOLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute, which I send to the desk, for the pending bill and amendments.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

A bill amending the pension laws.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in considering claims filed under the pension laws the death of an enlisted man or officer shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued and unexplained absence of such enlisted man or officer from his home and family for a period of seven years, during which period no intelligence of his existence shall have been received, and any pension granted under this proviso shall cease upon proof that such officer or enlisted man is still living.

Mr. POOLE. I ask the previous question on the amendment, the substitute, and the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being first taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the substitute, the question was taken; and there were—ayes 122, noes 4.

Mr. McCLELLAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that no quorum is present?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes, sir; that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (having made a count). One hundred and eighty-seven members are present—a quorum. The ayes have it, and the substitute is agreed to.

The bill as amended by the adoption of the substitute was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER said: The changes which were made in the bill (H. R. 162) which was passed this morning, render the title inapplicable, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] desires that the title be corrected so as to read: "A bill regulating proof of death in pension cases." Without objection, the amendment will be considered as made.

There was no objection.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HITT. I ask consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized and allowed to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is this a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not privileged. The Chair has put the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I shall not object, as the chairman of our committee desires the adoption of the resolution.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, which was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MARTHA BROOKS.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to make an amended report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon the bill (H. R. 2800) to pension Martha Brooks. The reason for this request is that since the filing of the report we have come into the possession of some material facts.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman explain to the House the nature of the proposed change in the report?

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. This is a bill granting a pension to Martha Brooks. There is a material fact which we failed to state in the report as already filed—a fact bearing upon the merits of the case. I ask unanimous consent to amend the report by additional statements of fact.

Mr. MILES. I hope the gentleman will explain to the House what additional facts have come to his knowledge since he filed his report. I think the House ought to know those additional facts which the gentleman deems important.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. In the report as already made, it is not stated that the son of this lady was an unmarried man; but I have come into possession of evidence that such was the fact, and that she was dependent, and had a right to depend on him for support.

Mr. MILES. You find now that the son was not a married man?

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Yes, sir; we find that he was not a married man and that he contributed to the support of his mother.

Mr. MILES. I make no objection.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is found, as I understand, that this lady depended on her son for support.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Several MEMBERS. That is all right.

There being no objection, the request of Mr. BAKER of Kansas was granted.

ASSISTANT CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution which, when it was presented the other day, my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] objected to. Upon explanation he has withdrawn his objection; and I shall be glad to make the same explanation to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That an assistant clerk be allowed the Committee on Claims during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress at a compensation of $6 a day, to be paid from January 1, 1896, out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I will ask for the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be so referred.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. QUIGG. I desire to present a favorable report from the Committee on the Library on House bill No. 3553, and to ask that the bill be immediately considered.

The bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mary Park Foster (Mrs. John W. Foster), of Indiana; Mary Virginia Ellet Cabell (Mrs. William D. Cabell), of Virginia; Helen Mason Boynton (Mrs. Henry V. Boynton), of Ohio; Henrietta Greely (Mrs. A. W. Greely), of Washington, D. C.; Lelie Dent St. Clair (Mrs. F. O. St. Clair), of Maryland; Regina M. Knott (Mrs. A. Leo Knott), of Maryland; Sara Agnes Rice Pryor (Mrs. Roger A. Pryor), of New York; Sarah Ford Judd Goode (Mrs. G. Brown Goode), of Washington, D. C.; Mary Desha, of Kentucky; Sue Virginia Field (Mrs. Stephen J. Field), of California; Sallie Kennedy Alexander (Mrs. Thomas Alexander), of Washington, D. C.; Rosa Wright Smith, of Washington, D. C.; Sarah C. J. Hagan (Mrs. Hugh Hagan), of Georgia; Mary Stiner Putnam (Mrs. John Risley Putnam), of New York; Mary Leighton Shields (Mrs. George H. Shields), of Missouri; Ellen Hardin Walworth, of New York; Mary E. MacDonald (Mrs. Marshall MacDonald), of Virginia; Eugenia Washington, of Virginia; Alice M. Clarke (Mrs. A. Howard Clarke), of Massachusetts; Clara Barton, of Washington, D. C.; Mary S. Lockwood, of Washington, D. C.; Frances B. Hamlin (Mrs. Teunis S. Hamlin), of Washington, D. C.; Martha C. B. Clarke (Mrs. Arthur E. Clarke), of New Hampshire; Lucia E. Blount (Mrs. Henry Blount), of Indiana; Jennie A. O. Keim (Mrs. Randolph De B. Keim), of Connecticut; Louise Ward McAllister, of New York; Effie Ream Osborne (Mrs. Frank Stuart Osborne), of Illinois; Marie E. Devereux, of Washington, D. C.; Belinda O. Wilbour (Mrs. Joshua Wilbour), of Rhode Island; Georgina E. Shippen (Mrs. W. W. Shippen), of New Jersey; Julia K. Hogg (Mrs. N. B. Hogg), of Pennsylvania; Katherine C. Breckenridge (Mrs. Clifton R. Breckenridge), of Arkansas; Sara Isabella Hubbard (Mrs. Adolphus S. Hubbard), of California; Mary L. D. Putnam (Mrs. Charles E. Putnam), of Iowa; Delia Clayborne Buckner (Mrs. Simon B. Buckner), of Kentucky; Emily Marshall Eliot (Mrs. Samuel Eliot), of Massachusetts; Lucy Grey Henry (Mrs. William Wirt Henry), of Virginia; Elizabeth Blair Lee, of Maryland, and their associates and successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic, by the name of The National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, for patriotic, historical, and educational purposes, to perpetuate the memory and spirit of the men and women who achieved American independence, by the acquisition and protection of historical spots and the erection of monuments; by the encouragement of historical research in relation to the Revolution and the publication of its results; by the preservation of documents and relics, and of the records of the individual services of Revolutionary soldiers and patriots, and by the promotion of celebrations of all patriotic anniversaries; to carry out the injunction of Washington, in his Farewell Address to the American people, "to promote, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge," thus developing an enlightened public opinion and affording to young and old such advantages as shall develop in them the largest capacity for performing the duties of American citizens; to cherish, maintain, and extend the institutions of American freedom; to foster true patriotism and love of country, and to aid in securing for mankind all the blessings of liberty.

SEC. 2. That said society is authorized to hold real and personal estate in the United States, so far only as may be necessary to its lawful ends, to an amount not exceeding $500,000, and may adopt a constitution and make by-laws not inconsistent with law, and may adopt a seal. Said society shall have its headquarters or principal office at Washington, in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That said society shall report annually to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution concerning its proceedings, and said Secretary shall communicate to Congress said reports or such portions thereof as he may see fit. The Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are authorized to permit said national society to deposit its collections, manuscripts, books, pamphlets, and other material for history in the Smithsonian Institution or in the National Museum, at their discretion, upon such conditions and under such rules as they shall prescribe.

Mr. QUIGG. I ask that the report may be read.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the report is read I wish to state that if the gentleman will consent that this be made a corporation in the District of Columbia, I shall have no objection; but I shall object to the present consideration of the bill if it proposes to create a national corporation. The practice has been in incorporating benevolent and fraternal societies and orders, such as the Knights of Pythias and the Masonic fraternity, to limit the act of incorporation to the District of Columbia. If the gentleman will agree to an amendment limiting this corporation to the District of Columbia, I have no objection to the consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. QUIGG. The trouble is that these ladies have their organizations throughout the Union——

Mr. BAILEY. So have the Masons.

Mr. QUIGG. And they have their conventions throughout the Union——

Mr. BAILEY. So have the Masons and so have the Knights of Pythias.

Mr. QUIGG. This bill, Mr. Speaker, has been drawn with careful regard to the objects sought to be accomplished by this association. It is not in any sense of the word, if the gentleman will permit me, a selfish organization; it has absolutely no selfish motives or purposes, and does not intend to make any money or do anything in the way of business that will produce revenue.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me, in order to save time, it is utterly impossible to convince me that Congress can create a national corporation of this character. I would have no objection, however, if the gentleman will agree to amend so as to make it a body politic or corporate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. QUIGG. Very well; I will accept the gentleman's suggestion, if he will draw up an amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I will prepare the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York desire the report to be read?

Mr. QUIGG. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred H. R. 3553, report as follows:

The National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution is composed of women, descendants from participants in the American Revolution. They founded a society in this capital, with branches throughout the Union, nearly six years ago, for patriotic, historical, and educational purposes, and the bill reported herewith supplies them with a charter.

The objects of the society are purely patriotic, unselfish, and ennobling, and its accomplishments have already been numerous and in the public interest.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 3, insert, after the words "a body corporate and politic," the words "in the District of Columbia."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. QUIGG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT OMAHA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOWARD] has kindly agreed to withdraw the point of order against the bill I called up recently, or rather withdraws his demand for the regular order; and I desire now to submit a request for unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of that bill. It was read at length a few moments ago, but I send a copy of it to the desk, that it may be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill should be again reported.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I recollect the bill very well, and in order to save time I will state to the gentleman that I have no objection to its consideration, provided it can be considered in the Committee of the Whole. If the gentleman will modify his request so as to let it be so considered, I shall not interpose any objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. MERCER. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I accept the last suggestion, and ask consent that we proceed to consider this bill in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska to consider the bill in the Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, in order that the members may thoroughly understand the purpose and object of the bill, I wish to say briefly that it does not involve the expenditure on the part of the Government of a single cent of money, but simply provides for the transfer of the military reservation situated in the city of Omaha to the State of Nebraska for the purposes set forth in the bill. This reservation will be abandoned in the spring. It was originally donated to the General Government by citizens of Omaha some years ago, and donated in such way, as I understand it, that the reservation should always be used for military purposes. I understand that the title is in such condition that if the reservation is not used for military purposes the original donors are in a position to make claim for the land or part of it.

As shown by the communications appended to the report, Fort Crook, near Omaha, has been recently constructed; and but for the fact that some of the buildings there were not entirely finished this reservation in Omaha would already be abandoned. But at all events it will be entirely abandoned in the spring. This fact is established by the communication from the Secretary of War appended to the report. The Government has no further use for the reservation when it is abandoned as a military post.

I do not think it necessary to detain the committee with a more extended statement unless some gentleman has an inquiry he desires to make in reference to it.

Mr. MCRAE. What is the area of this reservation?

Mr. MERCER. About 80 acres.

Mr. MCRAE. And what is the value?

Mr. MERCER. I should think in the neighborhood of $70,000.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not know anything about this matter, but I would like to ask when this grant was made to the General Government?

Mr. MERCER. More than twenty years ago.

Mr. CANNON. How does it happen that the Government is through with it?

Mr. MERCER. The Government will soon have done with this reservation because Fort Crook has been established near Omaha, and that post will hereafter be used for the military purposes, the Government then having no further use for Fort Omaha.

Mr. CANNON. What is the value of the improvements placed upon this property by the Government?

Mr. MERCER. As to that I could not say. There are several buildings, some of them frame and some of them brick, which can be very nicely utilized by the National Guard for a school of instruction. This bill provides, as amended, that the State shall keep these buildings in as good repair as they are now, and the Government can take this property whenever it sees fit.

Mr. CANNON. Does the report show a copy of the conveyance to the Government.

Mr. MERCER. It does not. This bill was drawn by ex-Senator Manderson, of Nebraska, and protects the title so far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman ever examined the conveyance to the Government?

Mr. MERCER. I have not personally examined it.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman is not aware of the conditions in the conveyance?

Mr. MERCER. No, not personally; only from the statements of others.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think it would be well that we should know from the report, or from an examination of the conveyance, just the kind of a title the Government has to this reservation?

Mr. MERCER. The Government has the same title now that it will have after this bill has passed, virtually. It only conveys to the State the use of this property.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I understand, but the gentleman stated—and I merely want to get at the facts—that the conveyance to the United States was for occupation of this property for a post.

Mr. MERCER. For military purposes.

Mr. CANNON. For military purposes by the United States, and that if the United States should cease to occupy it for military purposes it would revert?

Mr. MERCER. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. What would become of it?

Mr. MERCER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], of the Committee on Military Affairs, desires to make a suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. It would not revert to the donor?

Mr. MERCER. It would not under the circumstances stated by the gentleman of Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and a statement was made showing this state of facts: That this reservation was presented to the Government of the United States for military purposes. The Government has used it and will continue to occupy it until next spring, when the Government proposes to abandon it. It is not the object of this bill to transfer the title of this property, but simply the use of it during the time that the Government does not wish to occupy it as a fort or reservation. The proposed transfer will not in any way involve the Government in a controversy with the donors of this land or subject the Government to expense. It relieves the Government from the care of the buildings and from the keeping of a small detachment of soldiers there. The relationship of the National Guard of the several States to the Federal Government, to which Guard the Government is making annual appropriations, renders it proper to turn over the use of this reservation temporarily for such purposes as the State Guards may require in conducting a school of instruction, and in the opinion of the committee this action will in no way conflict with the interests of the United States, or subject the Government to any embarrassment.

Mr. CANNON. Was the conveyance of this property to the Government absolute?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am not able to answer that question further than to say, from the report made to the committee, which they were prepared to believe, the conveyance was such as to give power to the Federal Government to make the transfer asked for in respect to use, but not in respect to title, and it was for that reason that the amendment was adopted by the committee. Let my friend understand that the bill did not go through the committee hastily or without due consideration.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, the object of my inquiry is to get at the very facts——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I do.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). It is to get at this very fact. It would seem that the committee is not even informed certainly about that—that the United States owns 80 acres of land in the corporate limits of the city of Omaha called Fort Omaha; that the Government of the United States has improved it.

Mr. STEELE. Will you allow me to have a statute read?

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. It has improved it. How much it has expended, whether a quarter of a million, half a million, or a million dollars, I do not know. Now, then, if the title of the United States in this 80 acres of property in the city of Omaha is absolute, and the United States has a post near by that it is expending money upon, then the question arises, is it not the duty of the United States to sell this property and reimburse the Treasury for the money expended? Now, on the contrary, if this property was deeded to the United States by one or more persons for use as a military post, and was to revert to the grantors if the United States should cease to occupy it, if we cease to occupy it by the United States, then I ask the question, is it not a fraud upon the grantors to grant it to some other use, or for the United States to substitute it for another purpose? Now, it seems to me that the House ought to have full information in the premises before it legislates. Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, or rather I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. I was merely going to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if there has been an attempt to dispose of this property?

Mr. MERCER. There never has.

Mr. STEELE. Then I would like to have the Clerk read the statute.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEELE. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I thought you were through.

Mr. MERCER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell the military reservation known as Fort Omaha, near the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, and such of the buildings and improvements thereon as can not be economically removed to the new site herein provided for. In disposing of said property the Secretary of War shall cause the grounds to be platted in blocks, streets, and alleys, if in his judgment it would inure to the benefit of the Government in making sale of said site, having due reference to the requirements of the houses and buildings located on said grounds, in such cases as they may be sold with the ground. The Secretary of War shall also cause the lots, lands, and buildings to be appraised and sold at public or private sale, at not less than the appraised value, having first been offered at public sale. The expense of advertising, appraisement, survey, and sale shall be paid out of the proceeds of said sale, and the balance paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. What is the title of that act?

Mr. STEELE. That is an act preliminary to an act to purchase a site near Fort Omaha.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to provide for the sale of the site at Fort Omaha, Nebr., the sale or removal of the improvements thereof, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

Mr. DALZELL. What is the date of that act?

The Clerk read as follows:

July 23, 1888.

Mr. CANNON. Is it an appropriation act?

Mr. STEELE. It was an appropriation act of $200,000, I think it was, for the establishment of another post within 10 miles of the city of Omaha. They had argued all the time that this property was too limited; that they needed a greater extent of ground for a cavalry post; and that by the sale of this property it would nearly reimburse the Government for the expenditure to be made. Now, why this ground has not been sold in accordance with the terms of the act I do not know, but I should suppose if the title was perfect it would certainly be no time now to put it on the market.

Mr. DALZELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MERCER. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Has the attention of the Secretary of War been called to this proposed legislation?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir. And the Secretary of War has made a report on it, as is shown in the report made from the Committee on Military Affairs. He simply says that the Government has no further use for this property.

Mr. DALZELL. He does not recommend the sale of the property or the gift of the property?

Mr. MERCER. He does not make any recommendation of the sale of it, either.

Mr. DALZELL. He does not recommend the gift of it, or disposition of it in accordance with this proposed legislation?

Mr. MERCER. No, sir; he makes no recommendation. He simply states that the Government has no further use for the post.

Mr. HENDERSON. If there is no further use for the property, why not realize on it?

Mr. MERCER. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, Senator Manderson in his correspondence with me has shown that there may be some question as to the title, and I quote what he says to me in reference thereto:

The bill can be so worded as to grant the use of Fort Omaha to the State of Nebraska in perpetuity, with the condition that the Government may, at any time it believes it advantageous for military purposes, retake possession of the land. There is a little question as to whether the complete abandonment of the reservation would not cause it to revert to the original donors, and this could be guarded against in the bill by having the General Government hold a string to the fort.

I have often heard citizens of Omaha express a doubt as to whether the General Government really held this reservation in fee simple, and I believe that if this bill fails of passage and the land in question is platted and offered for sale some of the donors—and I believe most of them still reside in Omaha—might take steps not only to prevent such platting and sale, but to regain ownership. I received a letter yesterday from a citizen of Omaha hinting that such a course need not be unexpected.

Mr. STEELE. Then the gentleman from Nebraska did not understand me when I asked him if there had been any question about the title to the ground?

Mr. MERCER. I must have misunderstood the gentleman's question.

Mr. HENDERSON. This is not a bill to sell the property?

Mr. MERCER. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the purpose is to make this a State military institution for the benefit of the State National Guard of Nebraska, and the legislature of the State at its last session passed a joint resolution asking that this step be taken, and intimating to the General Government that the State of Nebraska would take charge of such an institution and would take pleasure in continuing it as a State military institution under the supervision of the War Department.

Mr. MILES. In addition to that, your bill provides that the adjutant-general of the State shall make an annual report to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MERCER. Yes; and in addition to that the bill provides that a Regular Army officer shall make an examination of this educational institution every year and report to the Secretary of War.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill seems to be that the Fort Omaha Military Reservation shall be used by the State of Nebraska for a school of instruction for the State National Guard?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is that institution to be maintained at the expense of the United States or at the expense of the State of Nebraska?

Mr. MERCER. At the expense of the State of Nebraska entirely.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Does the State of Nebraska agree to keep up the buildings and to make all necessary improvements, and return the property in its present condition whenever the United States requires it to be returned?

Mr. MERCER. Well, I take it that the legislature of Nebraska indicated as much when it passed a joint resolution asking for the passage by Congress of a bill of this character.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. One more question. What is the limit of time? When is this grant to end?

Mr. MERCER. Whenever the General Government shall see fit to resume possession.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is that expressed in the bill?

Mr. MERCER. It is expressed in the bill.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to hear that part of the bill read.

Mr. MERCER. The gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, desires to make a brief statement about the provisions of the bill, as he is familiar with them.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the bill is so guarded that the Government can resume control of the property at any time, in the discretion of the Secretary of War. That is provided in the bill, and not only that, but the bill as amended by the committee provides that the State of Nebraska must keep all the buildings in good repair and must hold them subject to the inspection of the War Department. The bill simply gives the State of Nebraska the use of the property so long as the General Government may not desire to use it. Heretofore, in other cases, we have given these abandoned military reservations to cities near which they were located, to be used for park purposes. In the last session we gave to Newport, Ky., an abandoned military reservation to be used as a park, and we have made similar gifts to other cities—absolute donations; but in this case the United States reserves all of its interest in this property and can resume possession at any time, as is absolutely expressed in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. At that point will the gentleman please tell us what the interest of the Government is in this property?

Mr. HULL. The property was donated to the Government for military purposes. It is a military reservation which the Secretary of War reports that the Department has no longer any use for.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was it given to the Government in fee?

Mr. HULL. It was given in fee. We have the absolute title to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. But I understood the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] to state a while ago that some party claimed to have an interest in it or some control over it.

Mr. HULL. I think we have the absolute title to the property; but the Secretary reports that unless there is something done with this reservation, it will, under the general law, be taken out of the class of military reservations.

Mr. STEELE. Has the gentleman any information as to why the act providing for the platting and sale of this property has not been complied with by the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL. I have no information on that point. That question was not before us.

Mr. DALZELL. Is it not the fact that there is a military post within 10 miles of Omaha?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DALZELL. Is it not a further fact that that post was purchased subsequent to the passage of the act of July 23, 1888?

Mr. MERCER. I am not certain about that.

Mr. DALZELL. Is it not a fact that the act of July 23, 1888, provided first for the sale of this Omaha Military Reservation, and in its second section provided for the purchase of the other property?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman has the act before him and can answer his own question; but I would like to ask the gentleman if the same is not true in regard to the military post at Newport, Ky., yet Congress considered that it was better to let the city have that old reservation for a park, and gave it to Newport absolutely?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know about that. I know that I made an effort to have certain military property situated in my district and useless for military purposes turned over to the State of Pennsylvania, and the Secretary of War, under Administrations representing two different parties, opposed it and insisted that the only proper thing to do under the circumstances was to sell the property and put the money into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MERCER. I yield to my colleague [Mr. HAINER].

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, some confusion seems to have arisen in the minds of members with respect to this bill. It is a matter of very general information in our State that this tract of 80 acres was conveyed by the citizens of Omaha to the Government for military purposes only. In the event there is a general and permanent abandonment of this property for military purposes, it will of course revert to the donors. The property has been made valuable by the growth of Omaha. The proximity to business centers in that city gives it its main value. It is now no longer needed by the General Government. This bill proposes that the possession simply, not the title—I am following the language of the bill as contained in the seventh line of the first section—that the possession simply shall be turned over to the State for military purposes, thus carrying out the plain intention of the original donors.

Gentlemen will understand that since the General Government has no use for this property, it can transfer its possession to the State of Nebraska to be used by the State for military purposes. The passage of this bill will therefore really strengthen the title of the United States. That title, I understand, is not such that the property can be conveyed absolutely, because the conveyance to the Government was for specific purposes alone. The Government may have need for this property in the future; and it should so conduct itself in respect to the property that it may at any time retake possession of it. It is provided by the bill that the State shall take care of and maintain the property in its present state of repair. The State will doubtless make additional improvements, rendering it more and more valuable for the Government in the event that it should be necessary for it to retake the property. Now, I submit, it is only fair and reasonable, and is indeed the only reasonable use that can be made of this property, to turn over its possession to the State.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman examined the conveyance of this property to the Government?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have not made that examination personally; but I know that most excellent lawyers of Omaha have done so, and it is believed the title is in the condition I have represented.

Mr. CANNON. If the United States should cease to occupy this property for military purposes it would revert to the grantors?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir; when the Government abandons it permanently.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend think it is proper in morals for the Government of the United States to cease substantially to occupy the property for military purposes and still retain the title, complying with the letter of the gift, but sacrificing the substance, and thereby cutting out the original grantors from their real equities in this matter?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I by no means admit the gentleman's premises. I hope the morals of this House will allow this property to be used for the purposes intended by the original donors; that is, for military purposes. I apprehend the essential point is the use to which the property is put—not the party that may nominally occupy it for that purpose. Besides, contingencies may arise in the future, and doubtless will, when the Government will find a necessity arising for occupying this place as a garrison.

Mr. CANNON. The act of 1888, which provided for the purchase of a new post, and under which a new post has been purchased, provided absolutely for the platting and sale of this property by the Government. Now, the gentleman says that he has never seen the conveyance to the Government, and the report of the committee is silent as to that conveyance. I desire to know from some authoritative source what the title of the Government is.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that I think there is absolutely no question—although I can not give him information based upon my personal examination—that the title of the Government to this land gives it the use of the land for military purposes only, and the very fact that there has been no absolute sale or disposition of the property under the statute to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would certainly give color to the proposition for which I contend.

Mr. DINGLEY. I remember very well what was said in 1888 in reference to this matter. It was then stated that the Government owned these 80 acres in Omaha, and that by establishing a new post 10 miles out of the city and selling these 80 acres the Government would obtain means enough not only to pay for the land which would be required outside for the new post, but also to pay for the buildings. It was not suggested at that time that the Government did not own this property in fee. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether a copy of the deed of conveyance has been laid before the Committee on Military Affairs, so as to show clearly what the title of the Government is. We should understand the precise facts before we act in this matter.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I submit to the gentleman from Maine that the mere fact that this limitation on the title was not suggested in 1888 is absolutely no evidence that it did not exist.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is true. Nevertheless, the House in 1888 acted on the supposition and representation that the Government owned this property in fee; that it had the right to sell it and cover the proceeds into the Treasury or to use them to pay for the new post. If we were deceived in 1888, we ought to know now where we stand in reference to this matter. I should like to know whether the Government has a title in fee to this property or whether the title is conditional.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I will say in response to the gentleman from Maine, as I have already said, that I have no personal knowledge on that point. This, however, I can say to him, that if, in the future, the Government of the United States shall desire to take possession of this property for any purpose it can do so under the provisions of this bill, and if it chooses, and deems that it has the title, it can sell the property. If an opportunity arises, therefore, for the sale of the property, it can do so to-morrow, the next day, or at any future time that it shall see proper. It is in no sense of the word prevented by the operation of this bill. The Government is not deprived of the power to dispose of the property in any way it sees fit; in fact, that is expressly reserved by the terms of the bill. All that the bill seeks to do is to give temporary possession of this property in the city of Omaha, during the pleasure of the United States Government, to the State of Nebraska. It transfers it temporarily to the State of Nebraska for the purposes contemplated in the bill, and it can be reclaimed at any other time for any purpose the National Government desires.

I ask my friend, and in all candor appeal even to the conscience of the gentleman from Illinois, if there is anything more than right and justice and fairness in the proposition?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is no use in disguising the fact from ourselves that when we make transfers like this of the use of Government property for such purposes it is practically a giving away by the Government of all right to it, for we never get it back. I would as lief give it to the State of Nebraska in fee as to transfer it to the State for temporary purposes, as the bill proposes, if we had the title to it.

But what troubles me—and I am not saying that I would not be willing to give in fee to the State—but what troubles me is as to the question of title. We ought to understand exactly what we are doing. We ought to act understandingly. If the Government owns the fee of the lands, that fact ought to appear in some shape or other before the bill is passed, and then we can determine what to do.

We legislated in 1880 on the presumption that the Government did own the fee to this property, and we directed its sale for the purpose of the construction of another military post at some distance from Omaha. It is now claimed that we did not own the fee to it. We ought to have some light upon the question.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It makes absolutely no difference, let me state to the gentleman from Maine, whether the Government owns the title to the property in fee or not. It has a title whether it be a contingent, a conditional, or an absolute title; but whatever the title of the Government is, it is all retained by the terms of this bill. There is absolutely no conveyance of any kind but the temporary possession. For myself I hope it may turn out the Government has the absolute title to the property, and would have the magnanimity to do what justice requires it to do; that is, to convey it absolutely to the State of Nebraska, now that it no longer has need for it and proposes to abandon it. By so doing it would simply return the gift to the State. I do not believe in the practice of making merchandise of gifts.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you know that the Government has not a title in fee?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not, of my own personal knowledge; but that is the impression which has been conveyed to me by reliable lawyers in the city of Omaha who have examined the question. They claim that the Government has no title except the title that I have suggested.

Mr. DINGLEY. I heard the debate here in 1888, and I remember the House acted under the impression that we had a title in fee. Otherwise, if we did not have such a title, we could not have provided for the sale of the property.

Mr. HULL. Is not that true with reference to other cases; for instance, Newport, Ky.?

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, I am only meeting these cases as they arise. I would like to know something definite about this matter and where the title is.

In what part of the city is it located, and what is its probable value?

Mr. MERCER. This reservation is in the northern part of the city.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the value?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am advised about $70,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. You say that it is in the city?

Mr. MERCER. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you mean to tell me that this property in the city of Omaha is worth less than $1,000 per acre.

Mr. MERCER. Oh, well; we are a good deal like Chicago, a large city covering many acres; and land can be within the city limits without being in the business center.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, this property is not far from the business center of the city.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska, a question, with his consent.

Mr. MERCER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. When were the 80 acres granted to the United States; how long ago?

Mr. MERCER. I think over twenty years ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. Are any of the original grantors living?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, I think so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Have they filed a statement or request with the committee in respect to this new deal?

Mr. MERCER. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. HENDERSON. They stand by silently, and let it go on without protest!

Mr. MERCER. They have not communicated with the committee or me directly on this subject.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. MERCER. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, in the Military Committee we considered this bill very carefully. We did not consider the question whether the United States owned the property absolutely or whether it only had a permit to make a military reservation of it, because we considered that in these days when the Government is buying so many parks, it was not good policy permanently to divert any military reservation from the use of the Government if it needed it.

We all know that occasionally it is absolutely necessary for the Government to use lands near our great cities, especially in time of war, and we determined in this case that it was the proper thing to give a permit for other use while it was not being occupied by the Government, on condition that it should be maintained by the other parties, and we provided that it could be taken back by the Government at any time when it pleased.

Now, I want to say one other thing. Use by a State for a military school is regarded by us as use for military purposes of the United States, for the militia of the United States are a part of the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. MERCER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

The motion of Mr. MERCER was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the transfer of Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole. Without objection, they will be voted upon in gross, including the committee amendments.

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING OF CONSULAR REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will report.

The message was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanying the reports of the consuls of the United States on trade and commerce. In view of the evident value of this compilation to our business interests, I indorse the recommendation of the Secretary that Congress authorize the printing of a special edition of 10,000 copies of the General Summary of the Commerce of the World, for distribution by the Department of State, and of 2,500 copies of Commercial Relations (including this summary) to enable the Department to meet the increasing demand for commercial information.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 30, 1896.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The Speaker announced the following committee appointments:

To the Committee on Labor, Mr. WELLINGTON.

To the Committee on Railways and Canals, Mr. BELKNAP.

CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICT, ALASKA.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3964) to reorganize the customs collection district of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3964) to reorganize the customs collection district of Alaska. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the customs collection district of Alaska be, and the same is hereby, reorganized and established to comprise the Territory of Alaska, in which Sitka shall be the port of entry.

SEC. 2. That such other places as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, as the interests of commerce may require, shall be subports of entry or delivery, or both; and customs officers shall be stationed at such subports, with authority to enter and clear vessels, receive duties, fees, and other moneys, and perform such other services and receive such compensation as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the exigencies of commerce may require.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, and is also approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The necessity for the passage of the bill grows out of the peculiar condition of the district of Alaska. Under existing law there is but one port of entry in the district of Alaska. It is proposed by this bill to give to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to establish such ports of entry and delivery as the interests of the Government and of commerce may require. It must be remembered that the coast line of Alaska is about 2,600 miles long, and that the number of square miles in the Territory is over half a million. It is necessary, therefore, that this discretion should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury—a discretion given in only peculiar cases—to establish such ports of entry as the circumstances may require. The district of Alaska is at present increasing in population to a considerable extent, and its trade is increasing. This arises not only from the salmon fisheries, but also from the discovery of very valuable gold fields on the Yukon River. Therefore, in accordance with the request of the Treasury Department, and in accordance with the indorsement of the Committee on Ways and Means, we ask that this bill may pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia may be considered as reported to-day. It is not quite ready, but as I understand we may adjourn soon, I ask that it may be considered as reported, so that it may be printed and ready for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be granted permission to report the bill making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia to-day, for convenience of printing. Without objection, that permission will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that all points of order on the same be reserved.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be considered as reserved.

FOREST RESERVATIONS IN THE STATE OF COLORADO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the request?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I would ask that the title be again read, unless consent has already been given.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the Clerk had better report the whole bill, as unanimous consent is asked. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the forest reservations in the State of Colorado, known as the Pikes Peak Forest Reserve, the Plum Creek Forest Reserve, and the South Platte Forest Reserve, established by Executive proclamations dated, respectively, March 18, 1892, June 23, 1892, and December 9, 1892, in the State of Colorado, in accordance with section 24 of the act of March 3, 1891, from and after the passage of this act, shall be open to the location of mining claims thereon for gold, silver, and cinnabar, and that title to such mining claims may be acquired in the same manner as it may be acquired to mining claims upon the other mineral lands of the United States for such purposes: Provided, That all locations of mining claims heretofore made in good faith within said reservations, and which have been held and worked in the same manner as mining claims are held and worked under existing law upon the public domain, are validated by this act.

SEC. 2. That owners of valid mining locations made and held in good faith under the terms of this act shall be, and are hereby, authorized and permitted to fell and remove from such mining claims any timber growing thereon for actual mining purposes in connection with the particular claim from which the timber is felled or removed, but no other timber shall be felled or removed from any other portions of said reservations by private parties for any purpose whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does this bill in any way prevent any man who wants to have a ranch or little farming place there from having it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. This land is not open to homestead entry now. This bill purposes to open these forest reservations for the location of mining claims only. It is thought the amount that will be taken up by mining claims will be a very small fraction, and consequently that the purpose of forest reservations will be preserved, notwithstanding the location of mining claims thereon.

Mr. TERRY. It does not deprive any homesteader or proposed homesteader of any rights that he has now?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And it only applies to the reservations that are spoken of here?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does it include Cripple Creek?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is near Cripple Creek. It is supposed to be near one end and extends over some distance. I will state that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has approved a bill really extending it to all reservations in the State of Colorado, and the Secretary of the Interior has also not only approved this bill, but has framed this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and accordingly the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4991.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 4991, which the Clerk will report.

The title of the bill was again reported.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to have the report of the Committee on Public Lands on this bill read.

The report (by Mr. SHAFROTH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2280) "to open the forest reservations of the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims," has had the same under consideration and report it back with recommendation that it be laid on the table and that the accompanying substitute therefor be passed.

The particular reservations referred to in the substitute bill are in the mountains of Colorado, at such an altitude that only small timber will grow thereon. They were created not to preserve timber for the use of the Government, nor to serve any purpose of the Government itself. They were created by proclamation, upon the petition of the citizens of the State of Colorado, for the purpose of preventing the destruction of shade trees and underbrush in the high mountains, so as to preserve the snows from melting until midsummer, when the water would be most needed for irrigation in the valleys and plains below. Your committee is informed that the people of the State of Colorado would never have petitioned for these reservations if it had been understood that the miner thereby would be excluded from making mining locations thereon.

Extensive gold discoveries have been made on parts of these reservations, and it is important that mining locations be permitted thereon as upon all the other mineral lands of the United States.

In one part of these reservations a large number of mining claims have been located, and by reason of the impossibility of obtaining title under the present laws a chaotic condition of affairs exists there. Mining claims there are held by the uncertain right of possession only, which causes an unsettled condition of society and greatly retards the development of the mines in the district.

These forest reservations cover a great many square miles, and, in the opinion of your committee, if they are opened to the location of mining claims only, the area covered by such claims will be so small compared to the total area of the reservations that the purposes and uses of the same will remain practically unimpaired.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office has made a report upon this matter, suggesting a substitute bill to open all the forest reservations of the State of Colorado to the location of mining claims, with certain restrictions as to cutting timber thereon. The Secretary of the Interior in his report to this committee made further restrictions as to the character of the mining claims that could be located thereon and reported a substitute bill, which is the bill recommended by this committee for passage.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this bill, I desire to say that the timber which grows on the reservations referred to in the bill is very small. These reservations are located from 8,000 to 11,000 feet above the level of the sea. Part of the reservations are above the timber line, and only small timber grows at that elevation. Valuable gold discoveries have been made in these reservations, and it is important that they should be opened for the location of mining claims. About 4,000 people are now located at one point in these reservations. They hold possession of these claims only by sufferance. That causes an uneasy feeling. The result is that they are now in a chaotic condition, and it is important that that condition of affairs should be relieved.

The Government has no object of its own to serve in these reservations. They were not created for any governmental purpose. They were intended to serve no use of the Government. The only purpose for which these reservations were created was to preserve the snow from melting in the mountains until the summer, when the water was most needed for irrigation in the valleys and plains below. This bill, or a bill somewhat similar to this, was favorably reported upon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It was further reported on by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior framed this bill which has been recommended as a substitute for the original bill. I will gladly answer any question that may be asked concerning it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill covers any other land than that within the limits of the State of Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does not cover all the reservations that are in the State of Colorado. The limitation is simply to those reservations in the State of Colorado upon which gold discoveries have been made.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am satisfied.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If no one desires to discuss the question, I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I make no objection to this bill. I do not as a general thing approve of this character of special legislation. I prefer when we can to make general laws. I believe we ought to adopt some rational system of dealing with the forest reservations. They were made for a wise purpose, although under a law ill considered and very imperfect. The efforts to pass such a general law as a number of us would like to have has not been successful, and I fear will fail. We have not been able to get it out of the Committee on Public Lands in this Congress, and were not able to get an agreement between the two Houses in the last Congress; but as there seems to be a pressing necessity for permitting mining locations in a part of the State of Colorado, at least upon these three reservations, I have consented to a report on this bill, but I do not want to be understood as favoring such a policy for other reservations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I endeavored to have a general bill passed, and it met with the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but the Secretary of the Interior insisted that a general bill was not proper and that these reservations ought to be opened to the location of mining claims only as gold was found on them.

I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHAFROTH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CERTAIN CASH ENTRIES OF OFFERED LANDS.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1244) to confirm certain cash entries of offered lands.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not appear to be of sufficient importance to require consideration in Committee of the Whole, and I suggest to the gentleman that he ask consent for its present consideration in the House.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I accept the suggestion, and ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all private cash entries of public land subject to sale in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas as offered lands, made between the dates of the approval of the joint resolution of May 14, 1888, and its promulgation, May 29, 1888, in cases in which all requirements of law have been complied with, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and all such entries made between said dates which have been canceled for which the purchase money has not been refunded shall be reinstated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the application of the purchaser or purchasers or their legal representatives or assigns: Provided, That no adverse claim has attached or shall attach prior to such application for reinstatement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BISHOP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted, by unanimous consent, as follows:

To Mr. TYLER, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BELL of Texas, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. PENDLETON, for four days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HUBBARD, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BEACH, for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of A. W. Bradford, Forty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 650) to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. A resolution presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRISWOLD] in relation to the levels of the Great Lakes was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. He now asks, with the consent of that committee and of the committee to which he desires to have it referred, that the resolution be transferred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and, without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion of Mr. DINGLEY was then agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred, as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for two composite sailing vessels for the United States Naval Academy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, upon which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, it will, perhaps, never be necessary to discuss this bill as it came from the other House. But it may be said, it deserved its fate—strangled by silver. It was but the fraudulent pretext of response to the exigency which it professed to meet, and to the reasonable suggestions of the President, which it denied, while it avowed their wisdom. With the exception of provision for emergency certificates—which ought to stand in the permanent statutes—the House bill contained nothing commendable; everything else was but mockery of the legislation demanded by our fiscal condition. And so again, as a year ago, partisanship or imbecility, or both, has stricken Congress with paralysis, and the rescue of business prosperity from its recurring peril has been thrown upon the Executive. It is almost as fortuitous as fortunate that an old statute has remained untouched during our financial madness which can again serve the turn; and, although in a clumsy way, when considered with reference to existing conditions and suitable measures of relief, yet it shows God's pity and mercy are not wholly withdrawn from us.

If any trusted agents in private affairs should so deny duty and abuse trust as Congress did a year ago, and now again repeats, no judgment would be too severe in their condemnation. Over sixteen millions in the public debt were then thrown away in the reckless rage of partisanship; and the injury that must now be sustained by the people for the same reason is probably no less, although the exact measure of it is not so clear. Then the Republican management was able to show pretense that but for the Populists and free silverites there might have been relief. It was not true then; and this bill has now unmasked the fact by denying under Republican dictation the only remedy available to the menaced mischief.

This bond bill as it came from the House was a mere sham. It merits to be consigned to the hecatombs of folly's progeny, where the financial deeds of Congress for many years seem to belong. It is with no lamentation for the destruction of the primal stem that I turn to the graft which the Finance Committee has sprouted on it. It was a bad stock, though it has been budded with a worse scion. The best hope is that both will shrivel and die in the air of the Senate.

Mr. President, in this "august body" the story of Midas is the horror of horrors; everything turns to silver. The old proverb is, at least, one-half true, "Speech is silver," whatever silence. Hoping for action, in this assembly where words are chevaux de frise to entangle it, I have hitherto left the free-coinage question to be debated according to its ratio of 16 for to 1 against; sometimes impatient even of the delay the one could not but interpose to the progress of relief.

But it has come to pass that some say among the people, "Why do not they who oppose free coinage justify their faith in debate? Its champions are always ready. Why are its opponents slow of speech?" And perhaps, sir, it is a duty. At least, the time is not inopportune; and I am not unwilling to try the subject by the democratic principle which is the common sense of constitutional liberty, not less applicable to fiscal intermeddling than other paternalism.

But let me say, sir, at the outset, and once for all, that however warmly I may oppose them, I mean no impeachment of the good faith of any man's opinions on this subject. We have history enough behind us to know how devotedly men have stood to opposite sides of many a question of religion, and how manfully and gloriously they have maintained in flames of torment tenets which now the world derides. Let us therefore be tolerant of our mutual folly as adversaries on questions of finance—next to religion, the world's greatest breeder of errant fanaticism—and try by patient argument to exhibit to the tribunal of public opinion where the folly lies. One side or the other is egregiously mistaken. And it is of the highest moment to the people of this country to locate the error. They can not go on much farther without proving it on one side or the other, and most bitterly if the choice be wrong.

I believe, sir, that the financial distress and public misery of the past three years are the direct product of the efforts to force silver upon the country, and our course to relief is a return to sound principles.

Especially, sir, I believe that every step of the fatal progress in error has been opposed to the cardinal doctrines on which the Democratic party is based, and by which it must abide or sink in recreancy while the spirit flees from our institutions of liberty.

Just and equal laws, conservatively careful of the rights of all; relentless opposition to every form of class legislation; the largest liberty and the least possible interference by government in all individual affairs; are not these Laurentian strata on which must be builded the democratic world; and, in particular, when and how did the democratic principle come to tolerate under our Constitution the transformation of the Treasury into a bank of issue, or give authority to government to make other money than by honest coinage of gold and silver?

Yet, sir, not one of these familiar doctrines but has been trampled in the dirt by Congress in the course it has pursued in dealing with silver, and none is more flagrantly offensive to them than the measure proposed in this substitute.

The direct proposition now put before us is that the Government shall coin into silver dollars and other coin, at its own expense, all the silver which every owner of it, citizen or alien, may bring to our mints, thus giving substantially two coined legal-tender dollars for one dollar's worth of silver; that it shall then issue paper bills called silver certificates for the coined dollars, so as to relieve the holder of its inconvenience in weight and bulk, while the Government will store it for him without charge; and finally, that it shall maintain, at whatever cost to the people of the United States, the parity in value of these 50-cent dollars and silver bills with a gold dollar worth 100 cents. If this measure now gravely proposed by the Finance Committee shall be enacted, such will be the law of the United States.

Mr. President, there are three classes of people who urge this legislation, and it serves to develop its undemocratic nature to consider them by way of introduction to argument.

Those of the first class are at least under no sort of hallucination or delusion in respect to their purpose. They desire by this means to raise the price of silver in the market, either because they are producing it or might profitably work their lean or refractory ore if the price were higher, or because they are so connected in trade or community with the mine owners they think their pecuniary interests will thus be subserved. Comparatively few in number, yet this class is wonderfully potential. With them the silver agitation had its inception and has found its incessantly driving impulse. For them this is a measure of so-called protection, like a high tariff on home manufactures. Of course argument avails nothing with them, no more than with the money-gathering favorites of the tariff, or with the daughters of the horse-leech. Their only cry is more, more.

The second class might deserve sympathy, if they did not shock it. They are those who, owing heavy debts, wish to secure their discharge by one-half the amount of them; or by whatever less the silver dollar may be worth than the dollar they owe. The number of these is vastly less than the number of debtors. It might be thought there could be few such, and doubtless few there are who plainly avow it. The avowal is, however, not infrequently made, sometimes accompanied with sophistries of argument in attempted self-exculpation. I have heard persons privately maintain it, with brutal frankness; rarely in public.

For, Mr. President, let it be recorded to the good name of our country, it is not from either of these that this demand for free coinage derives its dangerous and menacing strength. Its power comes from the remaining class—the many—of whom some are profoundly convinced, and some have persuaded themselves into real belief, of the excellence of "bimetallism" for mankind; that the only road to it lies through free coinage, and that its ultimate benefits will compensate the misery and injustice through which it must be attained; or, perhaps, in some instances, that the injuries to immediately ensue will not prove so serious as they are represented. Enrolled among these are found characters of the highest grade, who command admiration and esteem, advocates of splendid powers to charm an audience and win favor. They are here, as we all know; and that they are constitutes with the people of this country the principal stay of this menacing agitation. "There's the respect that makes calamity of so long life." It is because of them and their advocacy that the duty arises to enter upon the patient and thorough discussion, with the hope that in the end error shall give way to sound understanding.

A fourth body of sometime silverites, the mere politicians, who are simply catering to the opinions of others, without other care than to make them helpful to their own ends, we may discard from the survey, numerous and noisy as they are; for they will drop the subject when men of fixed purposes no longer pursue it.

Sir, let me next invite attention to some interesting facts concerning the origin and course of the silver agitation in this country which, it seems to me, strikingly illustrate the relation to it of these different groups and develop to some degree the features which appear so especially abhorrent to Democratic principles as well as financial common sense. I hope to state none which can be fairly disputed, and all dispassionately.

The silver-producing country of the United States lies chiefly in the Western mountains of the continent, and among the mines the large producers are the property of no very great number of men, and generally held in corporate ownership. They are mainly worked by hired laborers, and the profits are realized by the stockholders or various owners, similarly to other great industries, whether of mining, manufacturing, or transportation. And although much is wasted in prospecting and experimenting, and many who seek fail to discover paying ore, yet the profits of successful mines are often enormous and many mine owners have won princely wealth. The mining establishments are often great in their immediate machinery, their operations upon and beneath the ground, and in the number of men employed; and intimately connected with them, though at some distance, are other branches of dependent business, as smelting, merchandising, transportation, and banking; so that, as is usual in regions where extensive enterprises are carried on, the basic business, as it underlies, also dominates the entire industrial community. Thus in a natural way—I am not speaking of it accusingly—there came to pass a unity, a solidarity of interest, of opinion, and of cooperation among the silver producers in the Rocky Mountain States, which embraced and governed not only those directly or cognately concerned in silver mining, but the far greater number, the interests of whose neighborhood, comprehending wide regions even, were more or less dependently affected. Newspapers reflect and feed the common sentiment, professional men share it, and politicians rise or fall with it. The keenest and best trained intellects, the most untiring zeal and fidelity, learning, science, invention, and skill, have been and are enlisted in the service of the silver industry, whose rich rewards incite emulating energy to the intensest effort.

Thus there stands, and for many years has stood, a solid body in our country, with great strength of numbers and riches, powerful in intelligence, learning and skill, keenly perceptive of its special interest, hardy and resolute to seek it. And that special interest—overruling, dominating, untiring, exacting, instant in season and out of season—has been and is to win and uphold the best market and highest possible price for silver. This solidarity has been not only of a class of people, but of a section of country. It substantially embraces the States of Nevada, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, the western half of South Dakota, as if they were but one political community, all classes apparently ruled by the dominant and controlling business; while the potency of this influence extends with lessening effect to several adjoining States, reaching, indeed, individuals far removed from the scene.

Such a wealth-getting and labor-employing business would be a powerful mover of public opinion, if aggressively asserted, in any State, as in some we see the manufacturers move church and state, with but rare revolt. In these Rocky Mountain States the task is far easier, because the population which is not gathered in mining towns or cities directly affected is too scattered, dependent, and incoherent to offer opposition. The veriest despot of story, the Grand Khan of Tartary, the Great Mogul, never had more submissive subjects than the Silver King of the Rockies; nor was ever tyrant more pitilessly exacting. No independence of thought or speech is tolerated there. No party, no creed, almost no business, can thrive which dares to doubt in the realm of that monarch the law of finance as it is in silver. The business man finds it prudent to say nothing and wisest to learn nothing antagonistic to his majesty's policy; and for the political representative who dares to flaunt his independence, woe betide him! Let him be anathema! Republican he may be, Democrat, or Populist, but always bend the knee in this presence; no teaching, no belief can stand against the supremacy of silver. Where is that sturdy Senator, the brave, unbending Carey, whose physical majesty was but the type of manhood it enshrined? Where is Dolph, the strong, able, and indefatigable, who never rested when his State or people had an interest in his charge? Look on the bloody Moloch of Silver to learn their fate.

Mr. President, for a generation we have heard the alarum of the "solid South," while partisanship bound a stricken people with iron hoops of political persecution, now at last, with devout thankfulness be it said, struck off forever. But even while they were so compressed in closest union, never was that solidarity comparable to the welding of all interests throughout the provinces of silver in one uncompromising, aggressive, intolerant phalanx to uphold and upraise the price of that metallic product.

The political arrangement of this country has happened to give this compacted interest—especially in this Chamber—an excessively disproportionate share of political power as contrasted with the rest of the Union, whether measured by territorial area, by population, by value of product, or importance in any other sense. Let me observe here that the seven States I mention, having here 14 votes out of 90, represent a population of about one-fourth in amount of the State of New York, with all its great interests as the metropolitan State of the Union, with only 2 votes.

And I need not say here, sir, where best their abilities and winning ways are known, that in no one particular has the shrewd sagacity of the silver-producing region been made more manifest than in the choice of Senators, and I may well add of Representatives in the other House, to represent and conduct its interests in national legislation. Their untiring industry, their indefatigable research into the history and finance of other nations to gather seeming argument, or to mystify it, their skill, their eloquence, vigilance, tact, and zeal have so signally distinguished their advocacy and management of the cause committed to their hands as to have won universal acknowledgment, and ought to gain them the plaudits of the constituency they serve so faithfully.

The extraordinary success which has been hitherto achieved in molding national legislation to the ends of the silver-producing interests, and the methods of its attainment, will ever be an interesting study to the student of affairs who turns his inquiries to the courses by which public opinion may be formed and led.

I can not presume to unfold the story, having no access to the counsels which have guided the campaign with such wisdom. But there are some public and unquestionable facts by which the ruling spirit that during so many years has never lost perception of its object may be traced.

Briefly note some of the features of this nature. Thus may I point out to those of our countrymen who are grounded on Democratic doctrine that the purpose of employing governmental power to foster the interest of a particular, a comparatively small and generally a wealthy, class has at least been the overruling and mastering purpose of the vanguard of the silver agitation, of the most solid, powerful, effective single force that has driven it forward on its rampant career. And to this add, as with equal clearness may be done, that up to the present time the only benefits which have resulted from all the legislation hitherto secured, the only gains it has yielded among all the losses of these years of agitation, have been the temporary enhancement or support of the market price of silver! I shall not now pause to deny what may perhaps be suggested, that even if all be so, yet it proffers no argument against the beneficent excellence to mankind of bimetallism, which is, after all, the supreme consideration. Let that pass for the time. Sufficient is it to my immediate purpose to set forth how both the originating, the steadily propelling, motive of one powerful interest, and the only resultant from all our legislation, have been extension of the vicious and wicked theory of protection to another kind of production, the fostering at enormous public cost of another special class of producing favorites. That it has been in design of and accomplishment for its most efficient promoters only another baneful species of federalistic Republicanism, against which, from its earliest origin, the Democratic party has stood uncompromisingly opposed in principle.

Mr. President, with this point in view, let me now recall somewhat from the turmoil of twenty years; which all must recognize.

Until about the time of the civil war there had never been any production of silver in the United States worth mentioning for quantity nor any mines of silver developed. Discoveries just made led, however, to some development during the sixties, but not to such extent as to affect the market. Silver, indeed, even after the act of 1873, was worth more than the $1.29 per ounce which makes the silver dollar equal in value to the gold. But in 1873, for purely public reasons, as seems to me proven by the evidence beyond all doubt, that law was enacted to revise our statutes relating to the mints and coinage by which the silver dollar was dropped from the system for the reason that its coinage and use had long been practically abandoned.

There was at the time no body of silver producers such as has since arisen; there was no silver interest which was conscious of any peril in that law. No one seems to have foreseen the future fall of silver in the market, or then to have dreamed that the act of 1873 could have effect upon it. Afterwards, some years afterwards, it became the policy of the silver agitation to arraign that law as the origin of the fall in price, and now to denounce the "crime of 1873" is as essential to the silver faith as a hell to Calvinism.

For, sir, the contest for silver was not set on foot until after increase of its production had become vast in this country and its price had necessarily begun to fall. Then it was, and not before, that the act of 1873 came to be so upbraided. I will not delay to inquire whether that act had any influence, or whether increasing production and the world's action outside of us were more effective of the decline, for it is now immaterial. But it has been proven to reasonable satisfaction that there was nothing unusual in its promotion or passage, that its entirely public purposes were abundantly declared in public debates and in public reports while it was under consideration by Congress for nearly three full years before adoption, and no fact or circumstance justifies the imputation of stealth or fraud in the manner of its enactment, or of wrong, in deed or purpose, to anyone who recommended or voted for it. The imaginary charge, also, that sought to link with its enactment the deceased bimetallist, Mr. Seyd, as a secret agent of a foreign conspiracy, was so utterly exploded in the debate of 1893 as to render that figment of disordered suspicion henceforth ridiculous. Whatever the effect of it, the act of 1873 can no more be denominated "crime" than the act of 1837 or any other piece of legislation. It was not until 1876, when the silver product of the United States had risen to $38,000,000 during the year, and silver stood at nearly 18 to 1 of gold in commercial rating, that public interest came to be manifested in Congress in behalf of silver.

Then it was, sir, although the silver dollar of the United States had never been a thing of common use or necessity, although in all the preceding years of our nation's experience, with the privilege of free coinage proffered to all, but 8,000,000 silver dollars had been made, and these chiefly exported or melted in the arts, then, when the mine owners of this country discovered the lessening price of silver while their produce of the metal was rapidly increasing, then it was that they sought partnership in the booty of protection and went into the councils of the "confederacy of rapine," demanding help to throw on the shoulders of the American people the burden of making a market and holding up the price for the produce of silver mining. The authors of the project were well instructed in the art which has been so serviceable to protection always in dealing with the people. They copied well the ingenuity which has made the galled shoulders of American labor submit to the yoke as if it were a stay and support. It was not the portrait of the silver-mine owner which was painted on the banner of the new crusade. Skillfully appealing to that quality of human nature which bows to the mysterious and indefinable, and worships most what it least can comprehend, the idol of bimetallism was raised before the popular vision like the golden calf before the Israelites, while the prophets of silver decried the good old faith that promises reward for simple industry and thrift, and turned our eyes from solid earth to the rosy pictures they have painted in the clouds. For twenty years we have been chasing that fatuous light, our heads swimming with the vision of a blissful condition, ever just before, when bimetallism shall swell the gains of the husbandman, sweep away as by a fairy hand the oppressive weight of debt and mortgage, and make the world rich and happy with the plenteousness of money for all, big prices for everything one shall have to sell, and easy getting of all one wants. Yet, alas! the lighter grow our heads the deeper sink our feet in the bogs to which we have been lured.

Oh, no! Not for the silver interest, but in the cause of the people, all was proposed, all has been done. For a suffering public the National Silver League, the National Silver Committee, the secret order of Silver Knights, and the friendly and substantial cooperation of the mining interests have self-denyingly contributed their labor and sacrifices.

Mr. President, a well-organized and well-managed agitation of any sort, so addressed to the people, will gain some hearers at all times. It is peculiarly addressed to people undergoing trials which sometimes disorder and oppress the laboring classes; and circumstances of distress, such as might well stir compassion in any human breast, have for many years combined to heap affliction upon a large portion of the agricultural regions of the country. The distresses which nature sometimes tolerates or inflicts, as if resenting the invasion of man's transforming industry, have during some years in different localities borne hard upon our husbandmen, and much have they suffered under the severe and unjust discrimination drawn by our taxing laws against the industry of the fields. None, it seems to me, sir, can contemplate these conditions without a profound feeling of compassion and of indignation, and with earnest purpose to redress and relieve them. Least of all can any just man find it in his heart to lay blame or reproach upon the cries of pain from a people afflicted to such a degree as has been their hard fate in many quarters of the land.

But, Mr. President, history testifies, by many a painful tale of ruin, that no people, at no time, is more susceptible to the seduction of financial heresies, more incapacitated for sound judgment on questions of public finance, than amid such trials of industrial distress. No wonder! How can men pursue abstract and laborious study with that serenity and repose essential to understanding of the laws of finance when every element of misery accumulates about them, when labor, however faithful and patient, fails of reward, when the fruits of the earth turn to ashes, all the arts of industry are mocked with nothingness, and only poverty seems to gain increase? Should we marvel that, when the old road seems so barren and dreary, the siren song, which tells of plenty in some mysterious way, wins the ear of troubled men untaught in the laws or experience of finance?

Thus it happened, sir, that the silver agitation began with and has continued to find peculiar conditions favorable to its promotion. On the one hand, a closely united, intelligent, aggressive, vigorous class, whose prime interest was unmistakable to themselves; upon the other, large numbers of people, like David's recruits, "distressed, discontented, and in debt," readily receptive to alluring promises of relief, easily captivated by arguments so pleasing to their necessities and desires.

And thus, sir, we have had for the last twenty years two objectives to the measures of silver legislation—the one real and certain, obtruded on the public view to the least possible degree, but urged with keen, persistent, never-yielding pressure to win the largest market and the best price for silver; the other, the asserted excellence of bimetallism, always the prominent one, though shadowy and uncertain, exhibited with glittering splendors of argument, clouded with battalions of statistics, theories, and assertions of example from history, showing superficially an alluring aspect of popular importance. The pursuit of one has been steady, untiring, successful; it has shrewdly held its course; grasping at every turn its peculiar advantage, seizing every benefit or gain available to its purpose, never missing to pick up the passing opportunity; while the other has been flitting before the popular gaze, a fluttering fancy, alluring and persuading onward the people, but ever escaping their reach, though it beguiled attention from the load upon their backs.

Bimetallism! High sounding and splendid! If only bimetallism, the Elysian days might come! But, alas, what is it and where is it? Like—

> Dreams that wave before the half shut eye,
> Or gay castles in the clouds that pass, forever flitting in the summer sky—always dancing before the vision, always something to be gained but never realized; the glittering bauble has fluttered on afar before the fatuous pursuit on which the public have so long been conducted, yet always to disappear save in the pleasing speech of silver advocates, while the realities of gain have been snatched by the other and mastering purpose.

Mr. President, from the beginning of this controversy to this very hour bimetallism, though always the signal word, has never been practically proposed to the action of Congress. At the time this agitation began, supposing it possible of continued maintenance at all, especially by the United States alone, which I do not believe, that bimetallism which our fathers undertook, and which is the only scheme with feasibility of aspect even, free coinage of gold and silver at the commercial ratio might easily have been established. Then the commercial ratio of silver to gold was but 18 to 1, and the silver dollar required but a small addition to the old-time quantity of fine metal in it. But there stood the silver interest, with the cry of the "dollar of the fathers," as if the fathers of our country had even dreamed of maintaining such a thing as a ratio of coinage contrary to the fact of value, as if it were possible to make anything else than silver monometallism by free coinage with an undervaluation of gold. So, at its inception, the cause was sacrificed to something which should give greater advantage to them who had the silver to sell. They must have, not the equal dollar which the fathers sought to have, but an inferior thing falsely gifted with the legal-tender quality, whereby their silver should have an added price put to it in their hands. But, notwithstanding, the followers of bimetallism followed them, seeming always to see their banner only in the hands which first had waved it, and the strange union of force swept its way through the House of Representatives.

Then came the realization. But of what? Bimetallism? Not at all. The very opposite. A sheer measure of protection to silver, a device to uphold its market price as a commodity; the Bland-Allison law of 1878, with all the Bland out of it, and nothing but the silver interest ruling it! The United States—what would the fathers have thought of such a scheme?—was forced into the markets as a purchaser, at the cost of the people, of silver which it did not want and only undertook to buy in order to maintain its price. And to what extent? Every year this Government was to buy three times as much silver as in all its past history had been made into dollars! Doubtless it may then have seemed to silver producers that the great object had been won; a market for the future and a guaranty against a fall in price. It did, indeed, exert a temporary influence; but the greatest result was to stimulate production and accelerate the decline.

A few years proved it a vain delusion. The people did not want silver dollars, and strenuous effort of the Government could force but a small quantity of the bulky pieces into the commerce and pockets of citizens. Yet, year after year, the country continued to buy what it did not want. The glutted vaults of the Treasury were piled with silver dollars. Large addition to their capacity was made, and still the mass piled up, inert, useless, practically valueless. The Government no more wanted these dollars than it wanted wheat, or corn, or oats, or any other produce of labor, to be stored in public warehouses. And still the price of silver fell, and fell, and fell! By and by came the election of 1888 and Republicanism triumphed. The protectionists had every hold of power, Congress and Executive. Protectionism was rampant, defiant, jubilant. This was the time for silver. The product of every other class favorite was given a new addition of price to be exacted from the people! Why should not silver share in the jubilee? And so the old banner of bimetallism was waved again in the sky, the old cry sounded, with a fanfaronade of new statistics and sophistries to explain the last failure and excite new visions.

Again the clamor for free coinage to redress the people's wrongs, upraise prices, pay debts, and spread a halcyon glow over all the troubled walks of labor. More history, jointed to need, more interminable talk, sharper cries about the gold bugs, fiercer imprecations upon selfish England, resounded through the country. But for what? Bimetallism? Again, not at all. Still free coinage of nothing but the "dollar of the fathers"—free coinage at 16 to 1 of silver now worth only 20 to 1. Again the bimetallism sought was the monometallism of silver! The mastering influence of silver producers continued to guide, watchful and sure that the price of the produce should dictate the measure, before whose advance the trumpets of bimetallism were sounded. And yet again the bimetallists followed their standard carried by the silver miners' color-guard, devotedly reckless where they led. And again the combination seemed pressing to its victory. Again apparently within the grasp of the confederated interest lay bimetallic free coinage, if ever to be had under a false ratio or in the United States alone. I have heard it said it was possible, though I am unable to affirm it, that free coinage at 16 to 1 could have won its way through the Fifty-first Congress; certainly nothing else seemed too monstrous to find favor there.

The House was carried and the Senate became the scene of decisive contest. Now again, at the crisis, the insistent silver interest dropped its popular allies for its special gain. The certainty of its advantage lay in the compromise called the Sherman Act, and the United States were driven again into the markets to buy a doubled share of this favored product of the mines; though it ought to be said that those who contested strenuously for bimetallism realized the fact and cast their influence and votes against it. That 154 tons a month, 54,000,000 ounces of the stuff every year, should be put upon one buyer, who should bury it, when bought, in vaults where it was as safely hidden as in the earth itself, seemed too promising of market and of price.

And for the moment the market jumped, and lucky speculators filled their pockets. But for how short a time the glow abided! Never was the fatal blight of protectionism better illustrated by object lesson. The rush of greed, overproduction, falling prices, feverish distress, as they always do, soon embittered all the earlier gains of the favored interest, and, infinitely worse, the world soon saw the Treasury of the Government begin to stoop under its tremendous load, that the back of the nation's credit was breaking. Then came the wild, ungoverned rush of fear, and panic spread its darkness over the land, conspicuous illustration of the eclipse of reason which begot it! And now the final stage in the legislation of the silver crusade! The Sherman Act was repealed, and all that remains of the twenty years is the disjecta membra of the dead statutes, an increased load of public debt, an enormous heap of useless silver, a well-nigh ruined national currency and credit, and bitter remembrances.

Now, Mr. President, whatever our differences on the point of bimetallism, our ends or hopes for the future, is it possible for a fair man to deny that, in point of fact, all the legislation begotten so far of the silver agitation took shape conformable to the interests of silver producers, and whatever of benefit—conceding any—ensued was theirs alone? In short, to that date, the resultant of all the struggling forces was a new measure of protection in our country, and nothing else—save its evils.

Sir, I can sum up this argument from the speeches of the two distinguished and powerful Senators by whom the people of Colorado proclaim their capacity to choose, and establish here their State, of less than half a million people, in equality with the strongest in the Union. When securing the enactment of the Sherman Act, the junior Senator said, in the debate on the 17th of June, 1890:

> The prosperity of the mountain States and the Territories of the West must ever rest chiefly on the product of its mines; yet we, who are less benefited than any other portion of the Union by the high protective tariff, are asked to stand by the duties which the East formulates; and when we ask that our silver shall also be protected, and have behind us the wishes of a vast majority of the people of the United States, we are called speculators and told that our ideas are those of a dissatisfied and visionary people. I wonder how long the Republican majority of Rhode Island, for instance, would last if the interests upon which the people depend for their livelihood were no longer fostered and protected by the party in power. The worm of Democracy seems already to have made some headway in that Commonwealth, possibly because its duties are not yet high enough. And how long does the Senator from Rhode Island expect the miners and farmers of the West will help protect the industries which he represents while he and other Senators who agree with him can find for us only words of criticism and denunciation?

Turn next to that moving appeal which the senior Senator poured forth here with a pathetic eloquence that touched all hearts in the closing days of the repeal! I am glad that after events have proved his fears unfounded. I shall not now extend my remarks by quotation from it, and especially as to choose a part were invidious. But let him who will read it, and, disenchanting himself, discern that from beginning to end it was but an appeal for continuance of a purely protective law.

And there, sir, I leave the subject, as it bears relation to the first class of promoters of this agitation. They have been the only winners; they perhaps won much for themselves in the gains of the years they enjoyed. I know not what, nor do I begrudge them a shilling. I will not arraign them for what the law of the land gave them to take, however much they contributed to make it. It is the false and evil spirit of such legislation, its injustice when tried by the rule of equal right, its iniquities in the injuries it inflicts on the masses of our countrymen that a few may be benefited, which I arraign and denounce. Let them support it who are inheritors of Federalism, and derivatively of monarchical distrust of the people and recklessness of popular right. It is their creed and portion. But it has no lot or part with the Democratic faith of equal rights for all.

Mr. President, can any man point out benefits to the people of the United States at large by the purchase during these years of the enormous mass of silver now buried in the Treasury vaults? Over 15,000 tons! Such another heap of silver metal, such another monument of folly, the world can not show! The people do not want it; they will not use it for money. Who that lives can tell when or how that immense and useless pile, that has cost so much of debt and trouble, will come out of its burial place to be put to any use in the world?

Mr. President, I turn now to the consideration of the nature of the claim for free coinage which actuates the second class of promoters, debtors who hope thereby to discharge their debts with dollars of far less value than those they owe.

Here, also, as throughout this argument, my purpose is to point out how abhorrent to Democratic principles is every motive, every suggestion of reason or basis for such a measure, while, at the same time, is shown its insupportability by every just standard of public judgment, and, as well, its futility to advance the ends proposed.

It is a proposal never brought forward in debate with that distinct, open avowal of meaning it really implies. Notwithstanding, I believe it has far more influenced the sentiments of some people, even in widespread regions, than all the sounding cymbals which have been rung by the forces of bimetallism at any stage of the contest. Nothing is more captivating or seductive than the whispered argument that tickles the ear with notion of private gain from some course advocated wholly upon other grounds. The wink will outweigh argument a thousandfold with men either weak in mind or strongly beset by distressing conditions. But it will rarely be found in this world, sir, that an argument which goes without words, covertly, with a wink of the eye or a nudge of the rib instead of fearless and manly discussion, is worth anything, even to those to be seduced by their supposed private interest in its effects. And so it is, sir, with this argument. It is a cheat and a fraud, and none are worse deceived than they who lend the greedy ear of private gain while they close the mind to judgment and the heart to justice.

Their postulate, plainly stated, is that the Government of this country shall debase the standard of its coin, making it a legal tender for a double value, simply that debtors may have the help of Government to defraud their creditors of what their promises and the law entitles them. Let ingenuity and sophistry say what they may, such a proposal can never enter into the judgment of the world, except as a measure of wrong and outrage. It has sometimes been the trick of kings to cheat their subjects, but never without the execration of mankind, not more for its immorality than for its evil consequences.

What does it mean, sir, in its best aspect? What one thing but this: that by law there shall be taken from one class to be given to another; that upon them to whom debts are due there shall be laid an enormous penalty, in hope that some of the gain of it may help the debtors. The Congress of the United States is invoked to enact a law that every man who happens to have his property in credits shall yield up one-half, or whatever the proportion, of his substance. For what? For any end of government? No; but that other men who happen to owe the debts shall escape one-half of their rightful obligations.

No sophistry can sweeten this to my mind or mitigate the horrors of its injustice. It means nothing less than the use of public power in destruction of the very objects for which government was instituted among men. If this may be done avowedly there remains no rule but the will of a temporary majority, unrestrained by law or justice.

And for Democrats, bred in that fundamental of Democracy which forbids the interference of government in the private concerns of men, what art or rhetoric, what bedevilment of reason can gild such a proposal or make it for an instant tolerable? We who have cried out against class legislation; we who stand here to-day pledged by every obligation of honorable men to strip down as rapidly as possible the hideous mass of class legislation which has fettered and impoverished the agricultural laborer of the country; we who rejoice in the name of Democrat, how can we talk of such a scheme but in words of burning condemnation?

I have heard it said, sir, that excuse might be found for such a course of legislation in the fact that debts are payable in the legal-tender coins of this country, including silver as well as gold; that they were contracted for payment, in some instances, when silver was equally current with gold, and, in other instances, when the current money of the country was worth much less than either gold or silver, and that such a measure would therefore be but redress or compensation for injustice done the debtor.

The proposition is delusive and untenable. It is not addressed, rightfully considered, to present conditions. The entire effect was accomplished when the United States, on the 1st day of January, 1879, resumed specie payment. For seventeen years since the measurement of money has been by the present standard. In all that period silver has been maintained at a parity with gold, regardless of its actual value. And to-day, whatever its enormous depreciation in real worth, the silver dollar of the United States still holds this equality, because the Government makes good its pledge of that parity. Beyond dispute, therefore, in all debts contracted since the 1st day of January, 1879, the consideration moving to the debtor has been the full measure of the present standard. Bethink you, sir, what is the proportion of the private and personal debts of the United States thus contracted. Doubtless not less than 95 per cent of the whole volume. Besides the debts of the Government and the large corporations of the country, not 5 per cent are fifteen years old. Five years will discharge the great mass of individual obligations. Debts of commerce are of much shorter duration. If we examine in detail the most lasting private obligations, real-estate mortgages, comparatively few will be found to have been created so long as ten years ago. Statutes of limitation are rarely over six years, except upon specialties. Of the debts of the Government only its bonds and some trust funds can fairly be called of older date.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will it disturb the Senator from Wisconsin if I ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to have just stated that since 1879 all debts, public and private, contracted in this country must of necessity have been and were as a matter of fact contracted upon the basis of the single gold standard. I wish to inquire whether that statement applies to the $62,000,000 of indebtedness incurred by the Government of the United States a while ago.

Mr. VILAS. Does the Senator from Oregon refer to the bonds?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, sir; I refer to the last public loan and the bonds.

Mr. VILAS. I stated that the debts had been contracted upon the present standard of gold and silver as we have it, with the silver dollar at a parity with gold. Of course, the debts which have been contracted by the Government in the last few years have been contracted on that standard and are to be paid upon that standard, I hope.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator believes, then, that the indebtedness of $62,000,000 contracted sometime last year by the issuance of bonds payable in coin should be paid in gold coin?

Mr. VILAS. They should be paid in precisely as good money as we have now—gold, or silver maintained at a parity with gold.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Is it not a fact that the same persons who took these bonds, speaking to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, agreed that if the bonds were made payable in terms in gold they would take them at a figure very vastly different from and in excess of that at which they did take them?

Mr. VILAS. Indeed, sir, it is; and it has always seemed to me a great reproach upon this body that we accepted gold and promised to pay in a standard measured by gold and silver at parity with gold, and then rejected the advantage which was offered.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understand that; but admitting that all that the Senator says is true, so far as that is concerned, as a matter of fact Congress did decline to authorize the issuance of bonds payable in gold in terms, and bonds were issued payable in coin only. Does the Senator think, in view of these facts, whether Congress did right or whether Congress did wrong in declining to authorize a gold bond—and I think Congress did right—that the bonds should be paid in gold?

Mr. VILAS. I think they should be paid in precisely what the standard of value was at the time when we made the debt; and every bond that has been issued by our Government ought to be paid in like manner.

Mr. GRAY. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, by what sort of moral casuistry he justifies a Government that issues a bond under the existing law, which provides that the Government shall maintain the parity of the two coins, in afterwards seeking to pay that bond in a depreciated coin, the depreciation being brought about by the Government's own action?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is not the question at all. It is not the question I submitted to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GRAY. It is the question which I put to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The question I put to the Senator from Wisconsin is simply this——

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Wisconsin answered it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. No; I beg pardon. The bondholders said, "We will pay so much if you will give us bonds payable in gold coin, and if you will not give us bonds payable in gold coin, but give us bonds payable simply in coin, then we will pay you so many million dollars less for your bonds," amounting to a difference, as figured out by the Secretary of the Treasury, of about $16,000,000 on this one loan of $62,000,000. The Congress of the United States declined to authorize an issue of bonds payable in gold coin, and the Secretary of the Treasury went on under the authority he had and issued bonds payable only in coin and not in gold coin. Now, what I want to know of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Wisconsin is, whether there would be any dishonesty upon the part of the Government in paying those bonds in silver?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Oregon declines to answer my question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Or would the Senator from Delaware pay the bonds in gold coin and thus give to the bondholders a bonus of about $16,000,000?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Oregon is better at asking questions than at answering them.

Mr. VILAS. I do not think there is a particle of difficulty about it. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he believes the purchasers of the bonds last year would have offered the United States as much by practically one-half the amount they did offer if they had believed the bonds would possibly have been paid in silver?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I only know what they agreed to do. They said, "We will pay so much if given bonds payable in gold coin; we will give you so many million dollars less if you give us bonds payable in coin."

Mr. VILAS. Will not the Senator from Oregon recognize that if the purchasers of those bonds had supposed it possible that they would be really paid in silver they would not have paid half as much for them?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then, if that is the case, and if that is what they thought, they tried to play a bunco game on the United States.

Mr. VILAS. What they proffered of difference represented simply the effect upon the market of the shade, the thin shade of fear, which the action of the Government had necessarily given to it, or the debates in Congress, perhaps, rather than the action of the Government.

The Senator from Oregon will acknowledge beyond all question that in the money markets of the world it sometimes takes but the mere breath of rumor to affect values by substantial degrees, yet not the hundredth part of what the fact which the rumor indicates would produce. Is that not true? Does the Senator from Oregon recognize that the difference that was offered in the case we have been speaking of merely represented an acknowledgment or reckoning on the shade of fear which had been cast upon the markets of the world?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I can answer that question by saying simply this: The Senator from Wisconsin has stated that the parties who furnished the money and took the bonds had not the slightest idea, as he thinks, that they would ever be paid in anything else than gold coin. Now, if that is the case, then by their coming in here and saying to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Congress of the United States, "We will give you so much if you make the bonds payable in gold coin, but we will give you" fifteen or sixteen million dollars, or whatever it was, "less if they are payable only in coin," they were simply, as I said before, undertaking to play a bunco game on the Government of the United States.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to pass his own judgment upon the purpose of those men, but I must differ from him in this respect. I think it was a most natural thing that purchasers of bonds of the United States (which were by law payable only in coin, and especially at the time when those bonds were purchased, this Government hanging over the brink of the abyss of a fall to silver payment instead of gold, a premium already rising upon gold) should want to guard themselves against the risk of the effect of that condition upon the market and be willing to yield a small shade of the annual interest in order to effect that result. It was not bunco, but a distinct, honest proposal which I confess I believed at the time it was made, with all our differences and with all our controversies, would be immediately accepted.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the language of the law enacted in 1893, which entered into the contract?

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir; I remember what it is, but I will be glad to have the Senator from Delaware call attention to it, because it is an explicit answer in the terms of the statute similar to that which I gave the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. GRAY. I read from the act approved November 1, 1893, repealing the Sherman law:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value.

Mr. VILAS. Let me add at this point that every bond issued since the act of July 14, 1870, reads upon its face that it shall be payable in coin of the United States of the standard value at the date of that act.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question? In the face of the law just read by the Senator from Delaware, giving bondholders the security of that provision, which he insists they had, why is it that they authorized the President of the United States to send a message to Congress recommending that we give them the guaranty of an additional law allowing them to have the bonds payable specifically in gold? If they already had the protection of the law, which the Senator from Delaware has quoted, why did they not stand upon it?

Mr. VILAS. The reason is perfectly plain. Instead of their depending upon the standard of value as it then stood fixed by law they wanted the authority of Congress that their bonds should be payable in the specific coin which they gave the United States for the bonds—gold.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. I must decline, Mr. President. However, if the Senator from South Carolina wishes to ask a question, I will yield, but I was going to say that I have already occupied more time in this way than I intended to consume.

Mr. TILLMAN. What were the prices of similar bonds on the market at that date?

Mr. VILAS. I suppose everybody must be familiar with the facts in relation to those bonds. If the Senator from South Carolina chooses to turn to the speech which I made about a year ago he will find all those points elaborately discussed and my views on them presented. I do not care to be diverted from the argument I am making now to chase down again the will-o'-the-wisps which were sufficiently disposed of at that time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Wisconsin decline to answer any further questions?

Mr. VILAS. I refer the Senator to the place where he can find the answer elaborated in full.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not give it here again?

Mr. VILAS. Because it would occupy unnecessary time, and I do not wish to be diverted from the argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALL in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. VILAS. I return again to the point I was discussing. Of the debts of the Government only its bonds and certain trust funds can be fairly called of older date. By far the greater volume of its obligations, especially of its pension charge, vastly outstripping in importance all its other permanent liabilities, has been imposed within the last fifteen years. So of the great corporate obligations. There is probably not 1 per cent of the enormous aggregate liabilities of the banking institutions of the country, of its trust companies, of its insurance corporations, with the exception, perhaps, of some policies of life insurance, which have not been entered into since the adoption of the present standard. And of railroad corporations, the largest corporate debtors, their bonded obligations have been entered into within that period or are, by the terms of the bonds, specifically payable in gold. Is it sought to relieve these great corporations, to facilitate their repudiation of part of their debts at the cost of the holders? Is this the thing which commends this scheme to the labor interests of the country? The question needs no answer. It needs not be said that unless there be some relief for private debtors this scheme is utterly without acceptation to any of our people. If, then, we grant this argument of compensating injustice as tolerable at all, its applicability can not possibly touch the twentieth part of all the private debts of the country. The lapse of time has robbed it of whatever force it might ever have exerted. The sophistry must fail to seduce even a willing judgment in the face of the actual facts to which it must be applied. If ever there were anything to justify such a basis for public action, its force was wholly directed to the period when specie resumption was under consideration. The moment that step was taken its force began to fail, and has long since evaporated.

The enormous disproportionate injury such a measure must inflict ought to condemn it in every fair mind, even of debtors who fancy any relief from it. Suppose it be granted that, by a free-coinage act, the standard value of money will be reduced approximately one-half, measured by the present worth of silver. It is obvious this would destroy to the creditor so much of the worth of every debt not specifically payable in gold. That is the one certain and immediate consequence. At once, upon such an enactment, thousands of millions of dollars, in the aggregate, are struck from our citizens any part of whose means is in the form of obligations for money. It will not alone be the mortgagee who holds a debt charged upon a farm, the merchant whose accounts represent supplies to families and to business in his neighborhood, the shylock, if you please, who has put his money to uses, or the petty neighborhood usurer who has planted his substance in chattel mortgages at high rates of interest; these constitute, all told, but a small proportion of the creditor class. But down go, likewise, all the accumulated savings of depositors in banks to an aggregate of thousands of millions of dollars, all trust assets, the inheritance of widows and children invested in stocks and securities familiar to business, the endowment investments of educational and eleemosynary institutions, all life insurance, all the pensions of the country; in short, the manifold investments of capital in every form of debt by which the business affairs of the country have been carried on and its useful establishments given income; by which labor has saved its accumulations, and provision for families and children has been made. The sufferers will be not only the few greatly rich; vastly more in the total aggregate are persons of moderate circumstances, or of the thrifty poorer classes. None would suffer more than the pensioners of the country, more and more dependent as the years roll on. Sir, the enormity of this proposed iniquity is incalculable, the injuries it would inflict beyond human forecast. The whole range of human history will furnish no parallel for such an unspeakable outrage upon a civilized country in the form of legislation.

Sir, is it possible to suppose that this American people, with their important concerns and interests, can be brought to the block for sacrifice in this manner? If this were not the nineteenth century, if this were not a land which had enjoyed a hundred years of freedom, if this were some darkest period in the Dark Ages, when force was concentrated in the hands of the few and the collar of servitude was worn by the multitude as serfs, the monstrous possibility might enter the brain as conceivable, but for the fact that no people who would tolerate it could possess such objects for sacrifice. But in this day and generation, with all the lights of science and experience, and the qualities of manhood in American freemen, this is the idlest, the weakest, the most impossible of proposals to stand upon the footing of a relief to debtors.

But suppose the thing possible, and the step taken. How would it avail the debtors throughout the country? Would it at once bestow the means by which to appear before their despoiled creditors and demand their obligations? Before they could discharge even their diminished debts they must obtain the dollars, silver though they be. The same old rule would still apply to them. However lessened in value, they will still be had only for labor or the produce of labor. And meantime everything except labor would change in price according to the change of scale for measurement of values. Labor would go lagging behind and strikes and lockouts prevail.

Utterly trivial compared with the enormity of the injury would be the gain of debtors when even any was so secured. Can one contemplate for a moment the ruin of credit, the destruction of business which such a blow at law and good faith would cause, without recognition of the certainty that labor and all the methods of labor would be left practically helpless? We had but a feeble sample of what would be the horrors of the situation in the distress of 1893. That was indeed but a foretaste; the preliminary shudder at the first glance of the direful possibility. The poor would not unload their burdens in such a day of financial misery and devastation. Their means of gaining money to discharge their debts would suffer a far greater proportionate injury than the measure of their debts would receive reduction. Labor finds its most active demand, its best wages, its most elevating and profitable employment in the days of universal prosperity. When business misfortune blights and checks the enterprise of the country labor is first to feel its devastating consequences and to be turned loose upon the world. The army of tramps takes up its ghastly march not when the sun of prosperity shines, but when it is obscured behind the clouds of doubt, disaster, and fear. Who, among all those who profess this expectation of relief to debtors, can put his hand upon any example in the history of the world where the debasement of the coin produced aught else but misery among those who need money the most?

Sir, let Congress, if it will pursue such a policy of relief to debtors, pursue it directly, and appropriate to all the debts of the land whatever percentage is thought fit to assuage the debtor. Far better that outrage upon the Constitution than this utter demolition of all the structure of law and order.

And, sir, let us especially note that somebody is to be cheated should the scheme prevail. It is constantly argued that with free coinage the price of silver will advance and the United States alone can push it up until it regains parity with gold at the ratio of 16 to 1. If that be so, where, then, will come this relief to the debtors? The silver dollar commercially worth a gold one will be no easier to get than the gold dollar itself. I grant I do not believe it. I have not the least shade of belief that free coinage by the United States will sensibly appreciate the value of silver; but I arraign the argument as utterly unsound, if no worse, which maintains this two-faced appeal to discontented debtors and sanguine bimetallists.

But sir, whatever may be the soundness or fallacy of the argument so addressed to debtors, there can be no question of one result. Where could the American lift his head among the peoples of the earth; how enter the walks of civilization and enlightenment without skulking furtively from the glance of scorn that would spurn the citizen of a country which declares its contempt for the obligation of contracts, which would take from its creditors, abroad and at home, the measure they hold our word of promise to give? Nor, sir, would it avail us in the long run if we could so make present gains as the price of shame. God's laws bind nations not less than individuals. The mass can no more escape than the atoms which compose it. And of all the laws which bind mankind, experience proves none more potential for good, none so promotive of national as well as individual prosperity, than the law of good faith, the honest face toward every obligation, whatever the apparent temporary cost and hardship. It requires no religious teacher nowadays to tell us that nothing more promotes the material prosperity and happiness of the individual than the upright character which will bend to no adversity nor peddle justice for the gains of iniquity. And so it is with the nations of the earth. National prosperity never long survived national honor, nor the honor of a nation the character of its citizens.

Mr. President, I think I may at this point challenge the judgment of every fair Democratic advocate of bimetallism that neither for the interest of silver producers nor of distressed debtors alone can the proposal of free coinage in the substituted bill be defended for an instant, because entirely intolerable to Democratic principle and indefensible upon any ground limited to these two classes. I shall expect such an adversary to agree that unless he can maintain the excellence of this measure upon the ground of the common good, not of class interest, his cause is untenable. And there I next undertake to confront him.

Without indulging in self-laudation, it ought to be said of a body constituted as is the American Senate that recognition will be universal here of the fact that the currency and monetary affairs of the world and every country in it are subject to some laws beyond the control of any legislature. The movement of gold and silver among men responds to natural law as surely as the currents of the ocean; and while the course or volume of movement may be altered by changing conditions, they will be stayed by no arbitrary decree. To bring to pass a beneficial change, the first essential is a true perception of the unfavorable conditions and the governing law. And hence, it must be acknowledged, understanding of bimetallism is not promoted by terms so often used by impassioned advocates before the people.

I confess to a certain admiration for what may be called the vocabulary of silver. It is to the full as curious and effective as the terminology of alchemists of the olden time. Instead of an inanimate metallic substance, like gold, copper, lead, or iron, to be regarded with reference to its utility and value, we not unfrequently hear silver personified in speech, and usually with a tender, feminine cast. "She" has her "friends" and her "enemies"; she has been put to woes that would provoke the indignant devotion of every chivalrous gentleman. She has been "degraded," "struck down," criminally put upon, "disinherited," nay, even "assassinated." Upon the other hand, there is gold, a brutal, ruffianly fellow, grasping all the good things of earth and putting the yoke of slavery upon all mankind. Him we should all detest and spurn; her continually court and love. Curiously enough, the union of these two in a so-called "marriage" is a thing to be ardently desired of all men. In like manner of argument, silver has also her vituperations. Whoever does not contribute to her "cause," that is, to advance the price of the metal in the market, is a "gold bug," the precise horror of which I have not yet been able to understand. Beyond all, such a man is accursed as a friend of England, if not actually bought to betray his country by British gold, that old, well-worn, and most powerful argument of protection in the tariff also. Yet I have heard the Senator from Nevada tell the Senate that England has so laid all the world under tribute that the debts of other countries to her people amount to ten thousand million dollars; that all the world ministers to her riches and yields her income. Would it not be wise for our countrymen to reflect that England has had a single gold standard since 1816 and free trade for nearly fifty years? Or shall we plunge deeper into folly if England has been wise before ourselves?

Sir, I once knew of two eager students of natural science who, coming into dispute concerning the manner in which the moon produces and affects the tides, and being unable to resolve it by mutual asseveration, fell to blows, by which course of solution both were seriously battered. Yet, notwithstanding, the lunar orb has not since ceased to draw the floods in her diurnal revolution, after the fashion which nature decreed. Doubtless, sir, the people of the United States may batter their heads together so long as folly and passion keep them at it, and yet the inevitable laws decreed by nature to monetary affairs will have their way also.

The word bimetallism is of no ancient date, and has but recently intruded into dictionaries. It is itself a product of "free coinage," well devised to catch the ear and muddle the brain, like many another patent medicine for popular consumption. It appears to be adaptable to vastly diverse and even antagonistic conditions. Two-metaled money etymologically seems to mean money compounded of two metals, or the use of two metals as money. In that sense, every civilized nation enjoys bimetallism at least, for all use both silver and gold more or less. Our country rejoices in trimetallism, for we employ three metals in our money. Bimetallism, if thus intended, is consistent with the adoption of either silver or gold as the standard of value. Is this, in truth, the meaning in which advocates of silver use the term, proposing by adopting their bimetallism to hurl the country from its present basis of business transactions to another standard much inferior? To charge them with it would but apply the rule of law that every person is held to intend the consequences of his deliberate act.

But I believe, sir, we shall all agree that bimetallism is intended to signify the use of gold and silver as money, each being separately coined, with such a quantity of metal in the common dollar unit of both as will not only make their value the same at the start, but by operation of the laws of trade or of public statute will keep it so.

The bimetallism which is extolled to us with so much eloquence must be such an employment of the two metals that the intrinsic or commercial value of both combines—through their adjustment in a perfect ratio of interchangeability, supported by adequate ingenuity of law, or the common consent of commercial nations—to fix and maintain a single standard of monetary measure into which the value of both metals enters and to which each contributes. This is the wedded bliss of the two-metaled union.

Two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one.

If we fail to secure the double cooperation, if either metal rules the monetary household, then the entire virtue of this principle of compound money becomes lost. It destroys the usefulness of bimetallism in this sense if the ratio of the two metals changes so that either becomes alone the monetary standard of measuring values, for then the other must yield to that measurement by the one, which true bimetallism abhors and must prevent, or be lost.

That moment when either metal fails to furnish equal contribution to the measuring standard of money by the sustenance of its own commercial value is the death of bimetallism, because then it becomes, with pathetic accent if it be silver, a commodity. There is no meaning but this, sir—which I, at least, am able to discern—in all the argument which is adduced to the beneficence of bimetallism. Otherwise there is no force whatever to the contention that by a standard money which enjoys the double value of both metals, the price of commodities will be enhanced and maintained at a higher level than if measured by gold alone. Otherwise the idea utterly fails that by the flow of one metal to whatever country lacks it in any degree the so-called equilibrium will be restored and the common unit of measure will be regained, if momentarily lost by any derangement. This meaning, Mr. President, was ably set forth in 1893, in a speech by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], with many learned quotations to support it. It is unquestionably the only true meaning, except the single one of the use of two metals without reference to the standard.

Assuming this as the true idea of the thing, I add for myself that if it be possible to have it, if it be a practicable thing to so adjust the use of gold and silver as money as to secure such an interfused standard of value, partaking of the value of both metals, which will continue permanent and stable, I am entirely willing and ready to accept it. Indeed, I have always supposed I was a bimetallist in this meaning of the term. I deny to any Senator, however able or distinguished, the least advantage by reason of professed devotion to the cause of "bimetallism," if by it he means, or reserves to himself the right to claim to mean, the idea of bimetallism in this interpretation. For here we all stand on common ground. The trouble comes when the question is put, How will you attain to this bimetallism? How will you provide for the use of both gold and silver on such terms that the standard of monetary value will be the compound of the values of both, and so abide, steady, durable, and trustworthy? There arises the illusory problem which no one solves, there lies the cause which turns this well-desired bimetallism into an airy phantom, ever dancing before the eye of fatuous pursuit.

Sir, there is not to-day a country on the face of the globe where this bimetallism exists. I confess, sir, that until driven to research for the evidence I had always supposed it once existed among commercial nations; but I think no one can read the recent work of Mr. Shaw, his History of Currency, and maintain that opinion with undisturbed conviction. It is not, however, now worth while to dispute whether it ever had a really stable form, or whether, if the truth can be ascertained, its apparent existence has not been illusory and temporary. Silver has indeed at times furnished the measuring standard in many countries, but that does not constitute bimetallism. The fact stands forth, whatever the past, that at the present time no nation gives us the example of bimetallism; none can teach us how to create it or maintain it, under the conditions of to-day.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me at this point to state a fact which is germane to the question he is discussing? At the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted there was not a single government in Europe that did not grant to both metals the free and unlimited right of coinage. Granting this right through many centuries of free and unlimited coinage to both metals, can the Senator name a single one of those European Governments that dropped silver out of coinage when there was any disparity between the value of the bullion of both metals or the money coined out of both metals? Was silver dropped out of coinage on account of any disparity at the time in the bullion value of the two metals or the money value of the two metals?

Mr. VILAS. I think if I had the material at hand that I could mention the countries and show to the Senator that when there was free coinage of the two metals in the manner of which he speaks there was in no country continuously anything like the bimetallism of which we are speaking, and that the free coinage of silver was dropped by several of those countries when there was a considerable disparity between the silver coins and the gold, for the reason that they could maintain the circulation of silver best by having the standard of gold to measure the currency of the country, maintaining at the same time the use of as much silver as possible then.

Mr. PUGH. I have never read any such thing as that in history.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to commend to the Senator the work to which I have referred; but I disclaimed the purpose to go into the argument of the past, and therefore I do not wish to follow the Senator's interesting question further than to repeat that if he will turn to that work to which I have made reference I think he will find his opinion somewhat shaken, as mine certainly was when I read it, for I supposed the fact was that bimetallism had existed in the fair sense. But I consider it immaterial at this time for the argument I am now about to adduce. I repeat (and I think the Senator from Alabama, learned as he is upon this subject, will agree with me that I am stating only the fact), that whatever the past, at the present time we have in no nation on the earth an instance of bimetallism of the character of which we are speaking.

Mr. PUGH. Merely because silver has been dropped out of coinage.

Mr. VILAS. Well, for whatever reason.

This appears to me, sir, a fact of tremendous import. It is a fact which a wise and a sagacious people will not discard for a theory at the instigation of any class of men whose special interest is manifest. It is a fact which could not exist, it seems to me, if this bimetallism were the excellent and easily-to-be-enjoyed thing which we hear so often asseverated. For either bimetallism has heretofore existed, or it has not; and if you assume that such bimetallism has existed in the past, but all the world has turned from it, surely does this not prove by the experience of mankind that it is not useful and beneficent, as its advocates so loudly contend? It is idle to talk of a "gold-bug" conspiracy as the occasion of this universal transformation, if such it really be. It was not in the darker ages of the world that the methods of finance kindest to the people were known and followed, nor has the nineteenth century, the brightest of all human history, marvelously illuminated by knowledge in every other particular, become blackest of all ages in understanding of the true principles of finance. Sound and rational money is not only the hand servant of commerce, it is its essential and indispensable friend and auxiliary; and can any man delude himself that this age of unexampled freedom and magnitude of intercourse has grown more stupid and silly in understanding and use of money? No, sir, if this bimetallism once was, but has been superseded by all nations, that fact is as demonstrative of its inutility as the abandonment of astrology disproves the aid of the stars in foresight of human affairs.

If you indulge the contrary assumption, that bimetallism has never existed in this true sense, has never yet shown the world its beneficence to man, what is the task which they assume who undertake to impose their theory of it on our countrymen against the whole experience of mankind? They may, indeed, be right; but to demonstrate its excellence, much more its possibility, so as to justify exposure of the vast interests of this country to their experiment, ought to require such plentitude of reason as should win almost universal consent. Newton found the unknown law of gravitation, Copernicus the magnificent order of our solar system, and Harvey the circulation of the blood; and it may be that the mine owners of the West have discovered some way to compound gold and silver by separate coining of the two in one standard of money value after a fashion the world has never known. But if so, let them prove it, as Newton, Copernicus, and Harvey affirmed their discoveries to universal acceptance, without overturning our world of finance or drawing off our commercial blood. I repeat, sir, that the fact that all nations discard this bimetallism of which we speak is of tremendous import as a testimony of the judgment of mankind against this proposal, upon either assumption that it has at some time been tried or that it never did exist.

But, Mr. President, the only path to bimetallism proposed to our feet is a return to the practice of unlimited free coinage, the very practice which, once common, has been abandoned and discarded by the leading commercial nations, the brightest, best-instructed, highest-civilized peoples of the globe. Yea, even the countries of the Latin-Union, the friends of silver, the most faithful of all nations to the cause of bimetallism, put a stop to it before our act of 1873.

And now it is demanded the United States alone shall again undertake what all these people failed in together. Sir, the proposal carries its refutation with it, in the face of this history. At the very least, Mr. President, we ought to be given an argument for it that should be moral demonstration. No shadowy speculation, no theories maintained only by captivating eloquence, no appeals to class favor or the discontented elements of society can warrant such an experiment. Above and beyond all, sir, the argument which invokes the tremendous power of Government to such an object ought to stand upon a clear and just recognition of the rightful purposes for which government is created, the rightful uses to which its power can be addressed.

Now, sir, what, in the last analysis, is the great argument upon which this effort for bimetallism depends? Distinguish and discard the ad captandum appeals to special interest, the contentions drawn from words of the Constitution, the multitudinous, bewildering, and always disputed statistics and inferences from other countries, and especially the vociferation of passion and controversy, and what is the great argument on which, in the ultimate, the whole force of the bimetallic movement stands?

Sir, we had it, abundantly and ably given, in the speech of the Senator from Arkansas in opening this debate. It may be summarized as the argument of falling prices. In glowing rage we hear depicted the miseries of a community when commodities decrease in market valuation, and painted with the color of the rose the prosperity that attends their rise; and thereupon it is assumed, without warrant, as I think, in the facts, that the fall of prices during the past twenty years was due to the adoption by other nations of the gold standard and the demonetization by this of the silver dollar in 1873. A short answer, and a complete one, to the latter postulate is thatns 1a nc878 the United States has coined for circulation over fifty times as many silver dollars as in all its previous existence as a nation, and if silver money would raise prices they must have risen, not fallen, since 1878.

However, I grant that is not the bimetallism we are now discussing, and it is due to this argument, and to all the mischiefs it has done, to give it a far wider consideration, from the Democratic standpoint.

But in the first place, let me ask, is it an evil which mankind should defend against that the prices of those things which make for human comfort and joy should decrease? Is it lamentable that the family which depends for bread, clothes, and education on the toiling father's wages should be able to buy now, for one day of his labor, many times as much of all the means of happiness as he could thus have provided in past generations? No man worth listening to will pretend such a thing. Our civilization finds expression of its practical benefits more in the enormous increase of production and the constant fall of prices, not only of the necessaries, but of all the auxiliary comforts and luxuries which expand and sweeten modern life, than in any other feature. Nothing, except the wondrous works of God, can more excite delight and admiration than the marvels of human ingenuity in multiplying the objects and cheapening the production of the goods which mankind needs. Famine and pestilence have even largely yielded their horrors, and the life of man has been made longer as well as happier. Examine minutely the privileges and habits of the nobility of England in the splendid reign of the third Edward—we might even come down much later—and you shall find that the thrifty tradesman and artisan in our land today enjoys a more cheerful home, eats more varied, wholesome, and nourishing food, is supplied with and intelligently reads more and better books, and rejoices in greater advantages of education for his children. Indeed, not alone in personal liberty and the security of law, but in all their fruits, in all that makes for enlightened advancement and happiness, in the cheapened and ever-cheapening produce of science and invention, the prudent, sensible, well-conducted American citizen of this generation outstrips in the pursuit of happiness the noblest and wealthiest ranks not many generations gone.

Falling prices! May they continue to fall until everything of excellence shall be within the reach of all deserving men; till mankind shall revel in abundance. Falling prices mean shorter hours of labor, longer hours for enlightenment. It is the hope of the good and wise that looks to a coming time when all the earth affords for the needs and happiness of those man loves and toils for shall be so abundantly and cheaply provided that the curse of toil may vanish in the blessing of labor which is only beneficent.

But, granting all this, as I think the Senator from Arkansas meant to do in his speech the other day, yet it is argued that when the fall in prices is due to a rise in the value of money, by decrease of its relative quantity, so that all commodities are alike affected with depreciation, then evils of public distress, more or less severe, will follow.

Properly understood, this proposition requires no denial, although the effects are often overrated. Nor do I withhold hearty assent to the denunciations or interference by government to produce such results. It must be a rare case, indeed, if ever tolerable, when such an act will not be a perversion of the just power of government, iniquitous in policy and unjust in effect.

But this is only the half truth, not intelligent expression of the true law. There must be a deeper penetration of the subject if we will have a just understanding of its principles.

There are two aspects in which the rise and fall of the value of money is to be considered. The one its fall or rise from natural causes, so to speak; that is, its increase in quantity by new discovery in metal, new appliances of art, the application of greater human effort to its production; or its diminution by exhaustion of mines or relaxation of pursuit. The other aspect is the artificial rise or fall of money produced by interfering legislation immediately, or by subtle indirection, operative on the value of the standard.

Let us for the present pass the former by, and address attention to the right of governmental interference with the quantity or value of money or, in other words, with the standard of measurement of commercial values. It is with this that we are immediately concerned; it is the exercise of such a power that is proposed by this substitute. All natural causes or effects are here utterly disregarded, and the proposal now is to exert the full potency of the extremest legislation.

The argument of its advocates, strenuously put by the Senator from Arkansas in opening this debate, begins with the postulate, which I have accepted, that an increase in the value of money that causes a general fall of prices, is, especially when effected by legislation, an injury to any civilized community, productive of distress and injustice, and worthy of condign condemnation. It is next asserted that to diminish the value of money and thus produce a rise of prices is beneficial to society and productive of prosperity, and therefore legislation may be employed in this direction to win this benefit.

Right here, sir, I join issue and undertake to dispute the fairness or wisdom of the conclusion. It is, in my poor opinion, unsound in principle, inimical to the interests of this or any country within the civilized pale. Especially does it appear to me un-Democratic; in flagrant dissonance with those doctrines of governmental limitation and equal justice on which the Democratic party is built.

I grant at the outset that, in whatever way effected—by increase in the quantity of money or otherwise—the gentle and gradual diminishment of the value of the monetary standard will, for the time being and as its immediate effect, stimulate enterprise, increase production, tend to the easier payment of existing debts, and give the fictitious appearance of prosperity. But it is a short-sighted view which accepts these consequences as a real, especially a just and enduring, prosperity, desirable in the view of statesmanship to establish by legislation. It is the policy of the drunkard or opium eater who indulges the delirious joys of intoxication, reckless of the injuries and pains which must follow to his life.

It lies, sir, in the nature of the proposition that the day of reckoning must come, and will bring with it, in heightened and intensified degree, the very evils which we hear now so loudly denounced, the returning wave of a rising standard and falling prices, inflicted upon an overexcited and excessively indebted community. For how is it possible, sir, that there can go on forever a fall in the value of money, a continuing rise of prices, never to cease rising? How can the monetary standard be unceasingly depressed and diminished, and continue to exist at all? All reason and all experience show the utter folly and wrong of such a course. It is doubtless true that for even a few years sometimes there may be induced, by a skillful, gradual, and subtle change in the quantity of money—never by such a reckless and violent shock as is now proposed—a seeming flush of general prosperity, albeit at the cost of gross injustice to them to whom obligations are due. One generation, even, may sometimes thus despoil their children. But is that a policy to be pursued by an enlightened country, to be supported by Christian statesmen? History is full of examples of the consequences of such temporary and harmful prosperity, of the certainty of the pains and penalties by which it is to be expiated. It matters not whether the cause were natural or artificial. In every instance that consequence has been certain, inescapable, direful. Whether to a great nation or to a small community the trial has happened, with differences in time or degree, the retribution has been no less sure, no less compensatory. What halcyon days followed to Spain after the discovery of this continent and she had begun to gather the treasures of gold and silver from its native inhabitants or its mines! Yet what has been her consequent portion in the enjoyment of national power or in the welfare of her people? The Spain of Ferdinand and Isabella was a sturdy, vigorous country, with every promise of independent and growing importance. Swollen with her sudden wealth of money, she towered for a time among the nations of Europe. The golden stream ceased to flow and her lusty native strength had been ruined.

In closer view, not long ago we saw beaten, humiliated, impoverished France strip her people of a marvelous heap of money to buy her peace from victorious Germany. Yet how quickly did the unbending law of nature bestow rewards upon the country which had parted with its money, depreciating prices, and assign business misfortune, although not in that case lasting, to the other which had swollen its money volume with enhancement of prices?

It has been none the less true in the experience of the United States. We need not go back to the story that had its catastrophe in 1837, of unlimited paper issues substituted for money, until the allurement of rising values converted the country into a financial Bedlam, and the wreck of the collapse was wide as our settlements. We have had our example of too much gold as well. The abundance of Californian riches gave us the prosperity of inflation in the sixth decade of the century, and intoxicated the nation with rising prices, expanding credits, and entrapping the wisest in the network of debt, for which the panic of 1857 inflicted the penalty.

So, too, in 1873, was reaped the harvest of distress and ruin which followed on the inevitable and necessary turning back upon the artificial diminution of the standard of money which the exigence of war had occasioned. The financial terrors of 1893 are too near us, too intimately wrought into the fiber of this controversy, to admit of concurrence as to their cause. But, sir, I believe it will be written in history, when it shall be written dispassionately, that the same law of finance underlay the disaster of that year, precipitated to volcanic intensity by the Sherman Act of 1890.

Indeed, sir, I think it will be agreed by intelligent, acute, and fair masters of finance the world over that by far the greater number of all the pitiful catastrophes of business which have gained the name of panics have had their origin in some expansion of currency beyond the just measure of business need, begetting a fictitious rise in prices, with the inevitable allurement to unsound and speculative enterprises which stimulate credit and induce excessive debts. It will be surely agreed on all hands, even in this debate, that no cause can be more grievously or more suddenly productive of business ruin and universal distress than disorders of the currency. Yet, sir, is it not true that every disorder of the currency carries with it and begets its worst effects by derangement of the value of its monetary standard, albeit this may sometimes happen by the excessive use of paper credits as well as expansion or contraction of the supply of metallic money?

I have thus sought to point out that the theory of blessing from rising prices caused by the diminution of the standard of value is far from being a sound or useful doctrine. I can not trespass upon the patience of the Senate to elaborate the proofs or read the opinions of instructed and experienced financiers. If reason does not approve it to any, or induce the study which will convince the inquirer from the records of man's financial follies and suffering, I must now pass him by. Indeed, so much has been written by so many, and out of such errant minds, and we are treated here to such multitudinous and contradictory testimony, that if one offers as authority the opinions of the wisest financier he is liable to be confounded with the host of quacks whose financial nostrums are plentiful as the "leaves in Vallombrosa," and valueless as the figments of a dream. The important question now demanding attention is whether the powers of Government may be justly applied to reduce the standard of value and excite thereby a nominal increase in the prices of commodities. Nominal only, of course, because their true value is not in their relation to money, which serves as the medium of exchange, but in their relations to each other, or to the wants of men and the labor which will get them. I arraign this proposition as depending upon the abuse of power, essentially iniquitous.

It carries the curse of paternalism. It assumes that Government may rightfully interfere in the private and personal commerce of men to thwart the course which in exercise of natural liberty they would otherwise mutually pursue. It awards to the Government authority to interpose compulsion on the buyer to give the seller of commodities more than otherwise he would need to give. It is protection over again.

It means, sir, also, that the standard may be rightfully increased as well as diminished by Government authority. It means a right of oppression if political success throws Government into the hands of one interest as against another. It means to transform politics into huckstering chicane. It means corruption, and in its most deadly form, the debauchery of citizens, the destruction of patriotism. It means to rob Government of allegiance, law of respect. It strikes from the hearts of men the noblest sentiments and substitutes the basest. It is the law of might, which spurns justice for greed. It is to turn our hearts from the aspirations which have led men to liberty and fill them with evil machinations. Sir, we have for many years witnessed the perilous development of this spirit in our institutions. Let us stop it; turn it back if we can; but, for love of men, let us indulge it no further. It is the precursor of anarchy.

Sir, that spirit reigns dominant in every material feature of this project. Its name does not signify its chiefest wrong. It is not merely its "free-coinage" clause by which the Government is to be compelled to maintain its mints and without charge perform the work of making over into coin all the silver which any person, citizen or alien, may bring to it. That would be comparatively insignificant. But the bill requires such silver to be made into coins purporting and certified to be of twice the value of the silver, and leaves to stand in force the pledge of law that the United States will maintain their parity with gold, as now is done. It means, therefore, to give outright to the owners of silver bullion substantially twice its present value, if this Government can carry the load of that undertaking. This is the direct proposal of the bill, unless it be expected by its friends that the Government will repudiate its pledge or break down in the effort to keep it. Is this the doctrine of Democracy? Is this to be the portion of a free people who will have equal rights and justice in their laws?

But, sir, who believes the Government can succeed in such a desperate undertaking? The world now possesses, so statisticians say, in round numbers, somewhere about four thousand million dollars' worth of silver. If the quantity be but half so much, what will be our course when it comes rushing to our mints? There stands the pledge of parity; shall we try to keep it? Sir, we have lately heard much denunciation by the advocates of this measure against the issue of bonds to buy gold; but what will be the Government's necessity to buy gold when instead of 440,000,000 silver dollars, the obligation falls on it to support the parity of all the coin which can be made from all the silver which will be brought to our mints? What is the meaning of all this contradictory and confusing argument? Is the duty to maintain parity to be left obligatory upon the Administration? If so, why complain of bonds? It will at least require our buying all the gold in the world if we undertake to double the value of all the world's silver.

Or is it not perfectly seen and known to the friends of this project that parity disappears instantly with its enactment, because as impossible to maintain as to pump dry the Atlantic Ocean? Why, then, does not this bill repeal the parity law? Plainly, because that confesses it at once an enemy to bimetallism, the guaranty of silver monometallism, a measure of revolution and ruin.

Look to another feature. Not content with having the Government make coins of double value for the holders of silver, it is proposed to enact that these coins shall be a legal tender for that double value. Therefore, unless the parity be maintained, they will be available to pay old debts for nearly twice what they will serve to pay new ones, or to buy any commodity. For such an object the power of the United States is to be applied to despoil some of its citizens, to raise the value of silver for a time to those who happen to have it. Mr. President, very differently have I been taught the principles of Democracy. Am I indeed so utterly distraught and wild—I appeal to my associates on this side of the Chamber—am I such a wanderer from the great party of liberty and law which has professed to be the embodiment of the rights of man in their purest conception? I can understand how this can be demanded by the Populists or the Socialists, but never as consonant with Democratic principles.

For, sir, I can not but hold as a Democrat that the paramount duty of a good government is to extend to all its people the protection of law, the assurance of justice, the enjoyment of liberty; that its laws must rest on that natural justice which, like that of heaven, is no respecter of persons, but assures to all the perfect equality of right, preferring no classes, no ranks, no orders or conditions of men; a justice which makes an injury to the meanest citizen an insult to the State, and which will guard the righteous gains of its richest, as it will treasure the mite of the poorest for him. Above all, sir, a government which yields to every man, and all men, the utmost measure of lawful liberty the God of nature gave them; that full and perfect self-control which abridges only no rights of others to the same.

Sir, the Democratic party, as I understand its faith, insists upon the strict limitation of the powers of government and proclaims that government best which, while it most firmly protects and defends the safety of the person, the security of property, the obligation of contracts, yet least interferes with the natural liberty of man. That government the Democrat esteems most beneficent which all good men feel the least, except as they feel the joyous sunshine and the delicious airs of nature's glorious days to invigorate strength, elevate the mind, and swell the soul with happiness and pride. Restricted and applied to affairs of business, trade, and commerce, what Democrat but must say every interference is intolerable which abridges the most generous freedom, save in the interest of humanity, or for the overruling necessities of governmental support? Therefore, by inevitable consequence, the Democratic principle demands in respect to money that it should be of genuine intrinsic value and of the utmost possible stability and unchangeableness that nature will permit. Above all does it follow that no government can meddle with it for the gain of any class, sort, or condition of men, because that is a sure oppression of others entitled to its care, its jealous care, in preservation of their rights. For in this respect every change inflicts special injury and falls always hardest upon the most defenseless in financial affairs, the numerous body engaged in husbandry or who win their bread by daily toil.

Mr. President, in every aspect of its promotion, in every circumstance of its operation, this measure for free coinage is to be condemned by the sound faith of Democracy. There are those who, as my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] avowed yesterday, can support it as a measure of protection. It goes hand in hand with their principle, and it ought to go only with the practice of protection, avowedly put and understood.

I have already long engaged the attention of the Senate, and am unwilling to presume further upon its patience. I have not sought so much to present the argument of sound finance as to urge the antagonism of this measure to the political principles professed by this side of the Chamber. And I am but too painfully conscious how inadequately that has been done, how much more deserves to be said, and with what greater power.

For, sir, I revere the noble principles of the Democratic faith as the only true and righteous foundation of just government among men. I cherish the Democratic party as the only political organization through and by which their perfect work can be done in our institutions. And, never, in all the years while it bore so gloriously the rising fortunes of the young Republic, never yet was it so necessary to the American people as it seems to me today.

It is not, sir, that I covet a mere party success. Long and ardent as has been my attachment, it is only the victory of its principles I would seek, the happiness their faithful execution will bestow on our countrymen.

No Democrat can now survey the conditions which beset our public affairs without profound realization of the wide and perilous departure which has been made from the line of good government, nor without some shudder when he tries to penetrate the veil before our future.

Upon the one hand has arisen again to meancing height the Federalism of old, rejuvenant in the Republican party of our time, renewing its old theories inherited from absolutism, building stronger the tower of central dominion, multiplying extravagant expenditures, devising heavier taxation, and strengthening class riches and power, while burdens increase upon the masses. And on the other side, as the natural, the certain result of it all, there is looming the dark and portentous cloud of a party never known in days of Democratic justice; charged with wild, fantastic theories of social disorder and wilder schemes of remedy, threatening, should it grow apace, no one can foretell what violence of social tempest.

Their different roads both lead to the same end; their political polarity intensifies the strength and the evil of both, while they still will dicker in political traffic against their common enemy, the Democratic party, which, if faithful to its principles, will maintain our institutions and laws for the general benefit only of the entire people. Sir, there it stands, the old party of the fathers, the party of the people; humanly infirm, sometimes wandering from its faith and duty, as did God's chosen people, and visited like them with the penalty of sin and folly; but with all its failings, all its errors, still bearing on the ark of the covenant of our liberty with the tablets of the law of justice, peace, good government for men. Often has it been borne down in unequal strife, but never conquered; it rises ever again to struggle for the rights of man, the equality of equity in the dealings of government with all.

Sir, in the last thirty years it has been faithful to this duty when fidelity brought its followers contumely, trial, and sacrifice.

But it has survived to see the cause of justice triumph at its hands; and in the restored and perfect equality of every State with every other in the Union, and of all the rights of all the citizens of every State, now assured beyond the risk of peculiar peril, while the warm bond of a common patriotism binds all in closer fraternity than ever known before, the old party of Jefferson and of Jackson has won another honor, not the least among its historic glories, and which ought to fix it deeper in the hearts of all who accept its principles.

Sir, it will continue on its great career, and though adversities be decreed to its lot, it will not cease to strive in its mission to carry forward the Constitution and the Government of the Federal Union on their established course with power and safety, yielding neither on one side or the other to the reactionary forces of old absolutism or the lurid fires of anarchy.

Mr. BATE obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me for a moment, I desire to give notice that at 4 o'clock I shall move that the Senate take a recess until half past 7 this evening.

Mr. HARRIS. If my colleague will yield to me a single moment, I will state that in view of the notice given by the Senator from New Hampshire I shall be exceedingly glad if we can get an agreement by unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock, according to the notice of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senate shall take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, in order that all Senators who desire to be heard upon the pending measure may have an opportunity of speaking to-night, except my venerable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who desires to be heard when the Senate meets to-morrow morning. I should be glad to have an agreement that after the recess which is to begin at 4 o'clock this afternoon, when we break up to-night, it be to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and after the Senator from Vermont shall have concluded his remarks, that the Senate proceed upon amendments under the five-minute rule until we reach a final vote upon the passage of the bill at the earliest hour to-morrow that the Senate may be ready to come to such vote, not later than 2 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent for that agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HILL. There is no objection to that programme so far as it has been stated. Let this further understanding be had, and I shall be content. There is some question as to what the effect of such a unanimous-consent agreement may be. It of course will be held not to preclude a motion to substitute, to take up another bill, not to preclude a motion to lay upon the table, not to preclude a motion to indefinitely postpone. With that understanding there is no objection to the request.

Mr. HARRIS. A motion in the shape of an amendment in the nature of a substitute would certainly fall within the unanimous-consent agreement that I have asked for. A motion to lay upon the table would be perfectly legitimate in my opinion under such a unanimous-consent rule. But a motion, if such rule shall be carried, to take up for consideration some other bill would be wholly inconsistent with the very object and purpose that I have in view, and I hope the Senator from New York will exclude that proposition from his suggestion. Each of his other suggestions I concede as being perfectly consistent with the unanimous-consent agreement I ask for.

Mr. HILL. I do not think the Senator referred to a motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. HARRIS. That motion I think would be legitimate. It is a regular proceeding incident to the passage of a bill; but a motion to proceed to the consideration of some other bill would not be consistent with the consent rule I have asked for.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator from Tennessee does not preclude any motion whatever applicable to the pending bill?

Mr. PLATT. Not to preclude any parliamentary motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Any motion that can legitimately be made under the rules of the Senate I would hold to be in order under the unanimous-consent rule——

Mr. CHANDLER. As to the pending bill.

Mr. HARRIS. With the single exception that debate is to be limited to five minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Upon amendments?

Mr. HARRIS. Upon amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the way I understand the request.

Mr. HARRIS. I would want to limit debate upon a motion to indefinitely postpone, as that involves the whole question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood that there would be no debate upon anything but amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. But if I can get an agreement to vote at 2 o'clock, then I shall raise no question on the limit of debate even upon a motion to indefinitely postpone.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HILL. It is distinctly understood that the agreement to vote does not preclude a motion to lay upon the table, does not preclude a motion to indefinitely postpone, upon which I will say no debate is desired. I think the Senator from Tennessee ought to concede the right to substitute to proceed to the consideration of another bill. What objection can there possibly be to such a reservation being included in the agreement?

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. HARRIS). It will not hurt you any.

Mr. HILL. I make this statement because I recollect that in the Senate some time ago, when an agreement had been made as to debate, a question was raised as to what could be done after the time had been reached which was fixed in the agreement; and it was then claimed that a motion to indefinitely postpone was not in order, and it was especially claimed that a motion to postpone to a further date—the next session—was not in order. That is the reason why I make the suggestion. I wish the Senator would agree to admit the motion. It may not be made, but what harm can it do? If the majority desire to proceed to the consideration of another bill, it seems to me they ought not to be cut off at this time.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New York, as does every Senator other than he, understands the main and primary object I have in view. It is to reach a final vote by 2 o'clock to-morrow, in order that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in charge of the pending bill may be at liberty to leave the city for a short period, as it is important to him to leave at that time. Now, I shall have no objection to the motion suggested by the Senator from New York except the consumption of time. But if I can get the agreement that we shall come to a vote at or before 2 o'clock to-morrow upon the final passage of the bill, I care not how the time may be consumed until we reach that hour.

Mr. HILL. Then, with the understanding that the motion to substitute, if any, shall be made prior to 2 o'clock—is that satisfactory? Without debate?

Mr. HARRIS. If it be without debate, and the yeas and nays upon it, if the yeas and nays be ordered, shall not go beyond 2 o'clock. I am quite content to accept the suggestion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am quite content, too.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3964) to reorganize the customs collection district of Alaska; and

A bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims.

The message also announced that the House requested the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes, the original having been lost.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 1860) for the relief of John M. Guyton, late postmaster at Blacksburg, S. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to furnish a duplicate engrossed bill (S. 708) in lieu of the original, which has been lost; and by unanimous consent the request was ordered to be complied with.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

The bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PLATT. A bill is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary for the incorporation of the Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Perhaps the bill which has come from the other House had better be also referred to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SILVER COIN AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

FINANCIAL FICTIONS—AN EMERGENCY TARIFF AND A GOLD BOND BILL.

Mr. BATE Mr. President, finding myself unable to sustain either of the fiscal measures sent to the Senate by the coordinate branch of Congress, it is due to the people of the State which, in part. is represented by me in the Senate that I should state the reasons which influence my votes on the present occasion. Having on a former occasion in this Senate given my views fully touching the free coinage of silver, I purpose now to confine my remarks, as strictly as I can, to this substitute to the House bill and to do so as briefly as I can.

An emergency tariff, supplemented by a gold bond bill, is a combination of measures directly in conflict with the opinions and wishes of the people, as I understand the drift of public opinion. The one increases taxes not necessary to the support of the Government and the other imposes a heavy burden, both present and future, neither just nor necessary.

With an existing surplus of about one hundred and seventy-five millions in the Treasury, the temporary falling off of receipts from customs, consequent upon a temporary depression of business, will not sustain Congress in again disturbing the gradual improvements of business by an alteration and increase of customs duties. It was the general understanding of the people that this Congress would give to trade and business a rest from tariff agitation; and no matter which political party controlled this Congress, the virtual pledge was that peace and quiet should not be disturbed by the conflict between protection and tariff for revenue, at least until business and trade were once more fairly reestablished. It was the hope, as it was the right, of the people to have their trade, commerce, and business left undisturbed for at least two years by the warfare of politics over "specific" and "ad valorem," over high and low rates, over protection and free trade.

The officer charged by the laws with the administration of the affairs of the Treasury, as well as the President, have stated in their several communications to this Congress that the embarrassments which at present beset the Treasury result, not from a deficiency of revenue, but from a defect in the laws with regard to the redemption fund. These officers tell us that it is not a question of more money, but one of better money, which is causing the present trouble. And it must be apparent to all that gold can not be retained in the Treasury so long as the "endless chain" of greenbacks and Treasury notes are redeemed in gold, unless that fund is periodically replenished with the yellow metal by the sale of bonds.

The coordinate branch of the Congress takes issue with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and insists that it is more money that the Treasury needs, and proposes as a remedy a horizontal increase of customs taxes upon the consumption of the people. If the remedy proposed shall become law it would only have the effect of bringing more greenbacks and Treasury notes redeemable in gold into the Treasury, create more gold links for the endless chain, and supply the shippers of gold with more facilities for drafts upon the redemption fund, thus increasing rather than lessening the necessity for selling more gold bonds.

Congress has the power, but I deny the wisdom, of adding unnecessary taxes to the burdens of the people by collecting unneeded greenbacks which can only increase the existing embarrassments of the Treasury.

The Treasury and the country are now reaping that harvest of evils the seed of which was sown in 1873, and which have been diligently cultivated by subsequent legislation and administration. The remedy is not to be found in the quackery of a horizontal tariff, but must be sought in the heroic treatment which cuts out the ulcerous abscess planted by the demonetization of silver and inoculated by the gold standard. Neither will the unnatural stimulant of a gold-bond bill revive the sinking patient; the disease has become chronic from long abuse.

The able speech of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] conclusively demonstrates that the country in its trade and business is and has been suffering from the effort imposed by the demonetization of silver to do an increasing volume of trade on a decreased amount of currency. If that is a true presentation of the existing depression of business affairs, and so far no one has ventured to question his premises and conclusions, then neither an emergency tariff nor a gold-bond bill, nor both combined, will supply the only remedy which the country needs; for the former adds not a dollar to the currency, and the latter gives but a temporary relief to the redemption fund, to be soon again depleted and refilled by further sales of gold bonds.

The divided condition of public opinion is exemplified by the divergence of views on the currency question between the two Houses of Congress. The emergency tariff passed by a large majority in the other House is yet in the Senate Committee on Finance, while the gold-bond bill emerges therefrom as a free-coinage-of-silver bill. It is not necessary to consider now what political exigency compelled the construction of the Finance Committee of the Senate on lines of fiscal policy so entirely consistent with the teachings of that campaign of education which since 1892 has awakened the people to a full realization of the wrong and injury inflicted upon the trade and business of the country by the legislation of 1873. The people fully comprehended that though the "fathers" required the coinage of both "gold and silver," the "juggling fiends" of party politics palter with the country in a double sense and keep the word of promise to the ear by coining silver as subsidiary money but break the promise to our people by demonetization of the white metal.

The Senate Committee on Finance has, by its silver-coinage substitute, attempted to bring the country back to the constitutional currency of both gold and silver; to restore the only legal-tender medium mentioned in the Constitution, and which, but a few years back, was departed from under the Supreme Court's ruling that Congress could constitutionally invest the greenbacks with the legal-tender faculty. I am not here to impeach that ruling, but it is a fact, within the memory of all on this floor, that that ruling gave a rude shock to the convictions of every strict interpreter of the Constitution. Nor has it been entirely forgotten that the reorganization of the Supreme Bench, by which the ruling was obtained, elicited severe comments and much unsparing criticism. The legal-tender faculty was given to the greenbacks by adding one justice to the Supreme Bench, while it was bestowed on gold and silver by the Constitution. A few years after investing irredeemable paper money with the legal-tender faculty, the real constitutional legal-tender money—which required neither briefs, nor arguments, nor opinions, nor judgments to give it sanction—was demonetized, and the next year its chief coin stricken from the statute books.

To correct these wrongs, and to bring back to our currency the vast sums of silver now lying idle in the Treasury, is the purpose and object of the Senate substitute. Let the result of this effort be effectual or ineffectual, the consequence of the Senate's failure in this effort must rest upon that coordinate branch of the Government which shall assume the responsibility of refusing to the people a return to constitutional money.

The Senate, in providing for the free coinage of silver, makes no innovation upon the principles of sound money. It is an earnest and honest effort to restore to the currency of the country that money which, since Abraham bought the field of Ephron with "400 shekels of silver current money with the merchants," has been current in all trades and with all peoples until the gold interest interfered, first in England, then on the Continent, and finally in the United States, to disrupt the harmony which had existed between the two metals from the earliest times to the present day.

It is the claim of all political parties that they are bimetallist, holding with Mr. Jevon that "silver and gold alone are of small volume, easily guarded, easy of transport, divisible without loss, beautiful and brilliant, and durable almost to eternity," and agree with Turgot that silver and gold "became universal money by the nature and force of things, independently of all convention and law," and as such were recognized and required by our Constitution to be coined, and that to proscribe silver by law is a violation of the nature of things, as well as of the Constitution of the country. Such have been the professions of parties and their pledge in platforms, but the redemption of those professions and pledges have so disappointed the people that we are witnessing in some localities disaffection in political parties and bitter antagonisms in honored organizations of long standing. Party allegiance, once the strongest bond between men, has been so weakened by pledges unperformed that men, feeling self-preservation to be their first duty and the recuperation of trade to be the supreme necessity of their country, have in many instances sought political affiliation in new organizations.

It is a vain waste of time to tell the people that silver is not sound money. Such assertion is contradicted by the lesson of history. They know that the will of the state—the power of law—has heretofore maintained a statutory ratio between the coins of the two metals circulating together, and has floated irredeemable paper money on the stormy waves of war. The people do not believe that the cost of producing the two metals determines their value as money, any more than that the cost of printing fixed the value of the greenbacks, but they hold that the quantity of money regulates its value. They have seen the law of the United States maintain, through years of peace and war, the ratio of 16 to 1 between the coins of the two metals, and such is the faith and confidence of the people in the resources of their country that they are confident that law and its faithful execution and administration will again sustain and maintain the ratio of 16 to 1.

It may be patriotism, it may be pride, but it is also the positive conviction of the people that the position of the United States among the nations of the world is potential enough to stamp its declared policy upon those international exchanges into which the vast volume of their products enter, and to exert so dominating an influence over the commerce of the world that when once again this country has fixed its ratio and free coinage of silver has been entered upon, the same ratio will force itself into recognition in other nations. It is the common conviction of our people that with free coinage of silver there will be no inducement to export either metal other than arises from the necessary exchanges of commerce, and that "Gresham's law" will cease to operate under a legal ratio of 16 to 1. They hold that there will be greater stability of value under a currency of the two metals than is possible under any single standard.

But, above all the considerations which theorists have promulgated, our people believe that the greater abundance of money which the coinage of the now idle silver in the Treasury would throw upon the country would result in an immediate rise in values of all kinds, and that prosperity would quickly take the place of depression and our country again enter speedily upon that wonderful career of enterprise and wealth which was so rudely shocked and destroyed by the legislation of 1873.

The country demands an American policy for American affairs, political, financial, and commercial.

Mr. President, this Senate substitute emphasizes another fixed and settled purpose of the people—that there shall be no increase of the public debt by issuing bonds in time of peace. Such augmentation is repugnant in every sense to sound financial policy. It is unnecessary so long as hundreds of millions of silver bullion and coin lie idle in the Treasury. If it is desirable to retire the greenbacks, redeem them in silver. No matter what may be the present price of silver bullion in the markets, it can not bring a less sum than the Government realized from the greenbacks when first issued, with gold at a premium of more that two and a half to one. The Government can not pay less for greenbacks than it got for them on their first appearance.

When, in 1868 (January 6), the movement for the demonetization of silver was initiated by the honorable Senator from Ohio by the introduction of a bill entitled "A bill in relation to the coinage of gold and silver," the one-hundred dollar greenback was worth but $74.04 in gold or silver; that is to say, it took $133.25 in greenbacks to buy $100 in gold or silver; or, in other words, $74.04 in gold or silver would buy $100 in greenbacks, and the United States, which owed $100 in greenbacks, could have discharged its debt with $74.04 in gold or silver; but in 1869 it required $77.07; in 1870 it required $83.33; in 1871 it required $90.29; in 1872 it required $91.32; and in 1873, when the demonetization was finally accomplished, $89.28 in gold or silver would have redeemed $100 in greenbacks. In 1874 the metals had risen to $90.70; in 1877 to $93.46, and then to $100 in greenbacks. And the United States, which in 1864 got but $49 in gold or silver for its $100 in greenbacks, is now redeeming the latter at $100 in gold. In all those years silver and gold were money in theory, but neither was money in actual fact. Yet these values made the worth, in gold and silver, of the money actually paid for the United States bonds.

It was in 1868, the same year the Senator from Ohio initiated the movement to demonetize silver, that he wrote the letter read by the Senator from Alabama, in which he said:

I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds.

And—

If the bondholder can legally demand only the kind of money he paid, then he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand money more valuable than he gave.

The money that "extortioner" "gave" for the bond was valued in gold or silver at $74.04 in 1868. In 1870, the year the refunding act passed, the greenback was worth but $83.33 in gold or silver; and if the bondholder was paid to-day "in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver" he could have no just cause of complaint against either the Government or the Senator from Ohio. The United States bonds issued under the act of July 14, 1870, and its amendatory act of the Forty-first Congress (second session, Chapter CCLVI), amounting to $2,000,000,000, were not paid for in coin. They were exchanged for the higher rate of interest bonds issued during and immediately after the war. It was those higher rate of interest bonds for which the depreciated greenbacks, ranging in gold or silver value from $42.20 in 1864 to $83.33 in 1870, were paid, and the enormous profit reaped entirely from legislation were further enhanced by the fiction that "coin" meant only gold. Thus this shylock process went from greenbacks to "coin" and from coin to gold, and each transaction was a fraud on the taxpayer.

What part in that factitious enhancement of the value of the gold actually invested in United States bonds the demonetization of silver played it may be impossible at this time to estimate, but the restitution of silver to our currency and the payment of the bonds in silver equally with gold will restore the situation to the conditions in operation when the bonds were authorized, and when they were purchased by exchanging the old bonds bought with depreciated greenbacks. By legislation Congress has raised the greenbacks to the value of gold, and the country now demands that by legislation silver shall be restored to its exchangeable value in gold. If it is said that Congress can not restore silver, the country demands that we make the experiment, and so far as the redemption of bonds is concerned, it demands that we place the Treasury in the exact position that it was when the bonds were authorized and purchased with the positive legislative provision that they were redeemable "at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870"—three years previous to the demonetization of silver, and which "standard value" was specifically declared by Congress to be "silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver."

The act authorizing the 4 per cent bonds refers to and reaffirms the conditions of the act authorizing the 5 per cent bonds, which latter act was conditioned by the resolution of Congress—

That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said act hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver.

Thus conditioned, the bonds were bought and taken cum onere, from which they can not legally or morally be changed. The act of 1875 provided for the redemption of greenbacks "in coin" after the 1st of January, 1879. The people have no responsibility for that "fiction" of the Treasury which held "coin" to mean only gold. It was without authority or warrant of law, and the most charitable view of it is that it was a great mistake; but it would be a crime, not only against the people but against every law of sound finance, to invest a noninterest-bearing note in an interest-bearing bond.

Another fiction not born of law, but which, like Topsy, "simply growed," was the redemption fund in gold. The late letter to the Senate from the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that it was without form and void; that it had no local habitation in the Treasury; was never "segregated or set apart" from other moneys of the Treasury; but rested for its legal sanction on the inconsequential provision of the law of 1882, that—

The Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin in the Treasury, reserved for the redemption of United States notes, falls below $100,000,000.

Only that and nothing more is there to be found in the laws fixing or defining the so-called redemption fund.

Yet that fund is the "danger signal," to approach which is fraught with such dire consequences that the people have learned to fear some terrible catastrophe whenever the gold in the Treasury approaches the fiat minimum. And it is that same "danger signal" which is hoisted by the shippers of gold to force a sale of bonds.

Furthermore, the corporations which issue long-time bonds have accepted that "danger signal" as an excuse to demand gold at maturity. As late as the 18th of the present month the press has published that the Norfolk (Va.) Street Railway Company has effected a loan of $1,100,000 in 5 per cent forty-year bonds, payable in gold. But when it comes to making contracts like life-insurance policies, some of these corporations have made their policies payable in lawful money of the United States, whatever that may be at maturity. The gold rule does not work both ways, but makes receipts payable in gold while expenditures are confined to lawful money. This process is going on now all over the country, and what will become of it when these bonds fall due God only knows.

Hence it has been by fictions in the Treasury as to "coin," by a fiat minimum as to gold reserve, and the "endless chain" of the gold bankers that the Treasury of the United States can have neither will nor policy of its own, but has been manipulated from the outside and driven to increase the public debt within the last two years by these bond issues to the amount of over $150,000,000, and now, in response to the Oliver Twists "asking for more," is awaiting a popular reply to another issue for $100,000,000.

Since 1888, when there was in the Treasury in gold the sum of	$330,763,985
There has been added, in 1894, the February loan of	58,660,917
Also the November loan of	58,444,000
Also the loan of 1895	65,116,275
Making a gross total of	512,985,177
If from which is deducted the amount paid for United States bonds	262,552,930
We have	250,432,247

which has been sunk in that "Serbonian bog" we call the reserve fund, and afterwards transferred to the bankers' safes. And for that piece of financiering we can show only an increase of the public debt amounting to over $150,000,000, with another $100,000,000 of bonds to be handed over on the 6th of February. And there appears to be no limitation to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the public debt at the demand or in consequence of the manipulation of the reserve fund by the shippers of gold. Having started the resumption of specie payments by the sale of bonds, the ball can be kept rolling only by the continued sale of bonds.

All this is in consequence of legislation administered under the auspices of the gold standard. Silver has had no connection with that financiering, but—it has laid in the Treasury powerless, functionless, and guiltless of offense against the public debt.

> Cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in
> To saucy doubts and fears—

Hence, Mr. President, for these reasons I hail the Senate substitute with peculiar satisfaction. Its first section rehabilitates silver with its proper currency function, and it does that in a straightforward, bold, and defiant manner. Its second section removes all fictions as to "coin," clears away all clouds of doubt about the redemption of greenbacks by compelling their redemption according to the option only of the Treasury in gold and silver and taking away from the holder of a note the power and the right to name the money of redemption, restores sovereignty to the Government, and rests the selection of the kind of money with which its notes shall be redeemed in the sovereign which issued the note and stamped the image and superscription on the coin.

"The Man of Galilee," the Master, holding a silver coin, commanded that we "render unto Cæsar the things that be Cæsar's," that we give to government its proper prerogatives in all that relates to money, and honesty forbids any violation of the sanctity of contracts, as well by the holder of the note as by the Government which is to pay it. But as nominated in the bond so shall it be in the discharge, with the stern mandate that no blood be drawn in cutting the pound of flesh.

"Coin" is the word used in the Constitution, and that instrument itself interprets the meaning of "coin" when it says no State shall have a legal tender in payment of debts but gold and silver—not one alone, but both—and makes no distinction between them. Then I submit that it was and is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, when the interest of the Government required it, to pay any kind of governmental indebtedness in silver as well as gold. In the exercise of his discretion he has not done so, but paid out gold exclusively for greenbacks. This Senate substitute for the House bill, if passed into a law, will relieve this embarrassment, and when a raid is made on the Treasury for gold let the Secretary, if he will not so exercise his discretion, be directed to pay silver as well as gold for greenbacks when presented for redemption. This will break the "endless chain" and at once put an end to the shylock raids upon the gold-reserve fund, and do away with any assumed necessity for the issuance of bonds to keep this gold-reserve fund up to the $100,000,000 maximum. This, in my opinion, will end the trouble.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, the bill before us originated in the House of Representatives in response to an appeal made by the President in his message of the 20th of December last for aid at the hands of the Congress to meet the evils of our present financial system.

It presents a question familiar to us all in its varied phases; a question that occupied much of our time and attention during the special session of 1893, when we were called together to take action with reference to the operation of the act passed during President Harrison's Administration generally known as the Sherman law.

There were many of us then on this side of the Chamber who thought that the time had come for a change in our financial and coinage system upon the lines laid down in the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago, upon which platform we had but a few months before won a splendid political victory; but there were others who insisted that the financial disasters from which the country was then suffering were caused by the issue of Treasury notes under the Sherman law for the purchase of silver bullion, and that the repeal of the section of the law requiring the monthly purchase of the bullion would cause the storm to abate, revive confidence, restore activity to business, and result in a high degree of prosperity.

The moneyed interests of the country and the newspapers under their control took it upon themselves to censure those who were not satisfied with this proposition to repeal a single section of the law when we were pledged to the country to overthrow the financial system embodied in the legislation as a cowardly makeshift because there was not an immediate response to their wishes. But, after a prolonged debate, the unconditional repeal of the section of the law which had been singled out for attack was effected and the system which had been so severely condemned was allowed to remain upon the statute book, where it has continued to produce trouble, confusion, and disaster in the monetary affairs of the country.

The repeal of the purchasing clause did not produce the hopeful results which were promised to the country, and again the aid of the Congress is invoked to afford relief from the effects of the unfortunate and vicious legislation which has come down to us from our predecessors. The bills that have been passed by the House of Representatives to meet the difficulties referred to in the President's message only propose temporary relief without undertaking to remove the causes of the oft returning financial disturbances which hinder and retard the prosperity of our people. The one before us deals with only one phase of our financial difficulties, as did the act which was passed during the special session of 1890. The amendment deals with the whole question, and proposes to enlarge the basis for our money system by returning to a bimetallic policy.

This question is national in its character, and must be definitely settled before we can reasonably hope for the reestablishment of the business of the country upon a secure and permanent foundation.

The great political parties of the country have all declared themselves in favor of bimetallism and the use of both gold and silver as standard money, but in spite of these declarations, made often and earnestly, the country continues upon a monometallic basis, and silver continues to occupy the subsidiary place in our mintage to which it was reduced more than twenty years ago.

The first step toward a settlement is a proper and fair statement of the issue, and nothing is gained by attempting to represent those who think that all the business and credit and money promises and obligations of the world should rest upon two metals instead of one as advocating dishonesty; nor is it fair to charge that the advocate of a restoration of silver to the place as a money metal which it held under our Constitution and laws prior to 1873 is a silver monometallist who desires to reduce our people to an inferior civilization. There are a few silver monometallists in the United States, but they are not an influential class, nor are they likely to become so.

The great body of the American people are bimetallists, without respect to party affiliations, if we are to judge from utterances of leading public men of all shades of political thought, and from the platform declarations of the great national parties in the electoral contests which have been fought since the question has come prominently before the American people. Let us examine these declarations and the manner in which they have been fulfilled by the representatives of the different parties intrusted with the administration of the Government, after publishing to the country these statements of the views and policy by which they were to be guided.

Though silver was demonetized while the Republican party was in full possession of all the departments of the Government and responsible for the legislation enacted by Congress, the change to the single standard was never advocated in a Republican national convention before its accomplishment, nor was it afterwards mentioned with commendation as one of the great achievements of the party. The first national convention that met after the passage of the act was in 1876. The platform makes reference to the resumption of specie payments and promises the redemption of United States notes in coin, but there is no hint or suggestion that the recent statute had left gold as the only coin of redemption. Gold is only incidentally mentioned in the platform of 1880, when it is claimed that the Republican party "has raised the value of our paper currency from 38 per cent to the par value of gold."

It speaks also of a "solid-basis payment in coin for all the national obligations;" but there is no laudation of the act of 1873. It was passed by in silence. In 1884 the party declaration is for the establishment of an international standard which shall fix for all the relative value of gold and silver coinage. In bolder tone it is declared in 1888, "The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money," and an accusation was laid at the door of the Democratic Administration for "its efforts to demonetize silver," although it had been an accomplished and completed act nearly twelve years before Mr. Cleveland became President. In 1892 it was announced that "the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as a standard money." In a subsequent clause the efforts to secure an international conference upon the subject are commended.

There is no great difference between these declarations and those found in the platforms of successive campaigns proclaiming Democratic views and framed by Democratic hands during the same period, except that those in the latter series are rather more definite and emphatic. The first direct reference to the money standard in recent years is in the platform of 1880; the pledge was to "honest money—consisting of gold and silver and paper convertible into coin on demand." In 1884 a belief was declared "in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution," and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss. This language was expressly reaffirmed in 1888. In 1892 the language was, "We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage." It expressly insists upon "the dollar unit of coinage of both metals—of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value."

The new political organization which first nominated a Presidential ticket in 1892 and styled itself "the People's Party of America," but more commonly known as Populists, also made a platform declaration upon this subject demanding "free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1." Thus the sentiment in favor of the money system that existed prior to the passage of the demonetization act, which for a few years after that event was dormant and silent, has gradually been awakened and aroused as the effects of this legislation have developed and become manifest, until the representatives of the different political parties have presented to the country positive declarations in favor of the use of both gold and silver as standard money and pledged their different organizations to a bimetallic policy. It is indeed a remarkable fact that, notwithstanding the demonetization of silver and a continued adherence to a monometallic policy for more than twenty-two years, no political party has ever yet had the courage, if it has had the disposition, to go before the American people upon a platform advocating the single standard.

But although the national political parties were slow and cautious in their platform declarations in favor of bimetallism, the evil effects of this legislation which destroyed one-half of our standard money were soon felt, though the cause was imperfectly understood, and efforts were made as early as 1876 to reestablish the free coinage of silver and again give it the same privileges at the mints which gold has enjoyed. The first bill having this purpose in view was introduced by the late Judge Kelley, a Pennsylvania Republican, whose name is familiar to the country by reason of his earnest advocacy of the cause of protection during a long service in the House of Representatives. This effort in the Forty-third Congress failed, but a similar bill, introduced by Mr. Bland of Missouri, was passed by the next House of Representatives. In the Senate, through the active efforts of Senator Allison and others, this bill was transformed into a bill for the purchase of silver by the United States and its coinage into dollars to a limited amount. It became a law in February, 1878.

These dollars were made dependent for their value, in part, upon the assurances of the Government, as the smaller silver coins have been treated in our system since 1853, and as nickel and copper are, and always have been, treated. This system of monthly silver purchases and restricted coinage failed in its purpose. Though it added to the country's stock of subsidiary coin, which served as money of circulation, this circulating medium did not possess the most valuable function of perfect money—it could not be used to redeem the promises and obligations of the Government, or of private individuals, as gold is used. In fact, it continued to be a mere commodity, and its enlarged use did not even arrest the downward tendency of its market value.

Although there was no further legislation for twelve years, the friends of the double standard did not abandon their cause. The party platforms indicate from time to time the changes in public sentiment upon the great questions which come before the country and the progress and advancement of any particular views, and the expressions upon the coinage question from 1880 to 1892 afford an illustration. The law of 1878 satisfied neither political party, but the public mind was diverted for a time by propositions for international conferences to consult and endeavor to reach an agreement under which the principal commercial nations of the world might restore silver to its former place in their coinage systems with all the functions of money upon a uniform ratio. Three of such conferences were called and held, but no such international agreement resulted from their deliberations.

During this period of inaction the political power of the country was divided between the two leading parties, and delay and postponement were the natural fruits of a divided responsibility. But in 1889 the Republicans once more came into full possession of all the departments of the Government, and they had won their victory upon a platform, as I have already shown, favoring the use of both gold and silver as money and condemning the policy of demonetization. Some affirmative action was necessary, and the Sherman law of 1890 was the result. It was based upon the same plan as the Bland-Allison Act, of purchasing and coining silver on Government account; the purchases were to be made with Treasury notes instead of money, and a larger amount of bullion was to be purchased each month than was authorized by the former law.

The measure originated in the House; in the Senate the Democratic Senators, with the assistance of a number of Western Republicans, amended and changed it to a free-coinage bill, but when it went back to the House in this shape the silver-purchasing features were restored through the action of a committee of conference, and it became a law by Republican votes. This new legislation did not prove satisfactory to any interest or party. The price of silver increased while the debate continued and as long as there appeared to be a prospect of free coinage, but as soon as the new law went into force and its provisions became known the market began to decline even in the face of the increased demand created by the compulsory purchase of 4,500,000 ounces a month to comply with the law.

The presentation of the Treasury notes used in its purchase for redemption in gold depleted the Treasury, the Democratic party denounced it as a cowardly makeshift, and even those who aided in its passage readily joined hands with some of its original enemies, three years later, in repealing the section which had attracted the Republican friends of silver to the support of the bill, and the purchase of silver bullion to be coined into dollars was abandoned. Those who resisted the repeal did so upon the ground that the law should remain until some better system was agreed upon to take its place, and not because they favored the Sherman law as a proper settlement of the money question.

The passage of this repealing act left the country with a large supply of silver bullion and of silver dollars coined under the two silver-purchasing laws—the latter worth much less than their face value, according to the market value of the metal they contained—but still with the single gold standard. The people had to be content with a mere declaration, incorporated in the body of the law, that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of a safe system of bimetallism, and it was declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value. This pledged the country to the double standard of gold and silver, but left the single standard of gold upon the statute book and the battle still to be fought.

The victory up to the present time remains with the monometallists. They secured the passage of the demonetization act, and are satisfied as long as it continues in force. The time spent in fruitless efforts to secure a settlement of the question by international conference and agreement and in vain experiments in systems of silver purchasing and its limited coinage have enabled them to enjoy the advantages and profits of the single standard for twenty-two years. It is now proclaimed in some influential quarters that further legislation as to the basis of our money system is unnecessary; that the present system, based upon gold alone, is the best and only solution of the money question; that a double standard conveys no idea and is impracticable, and that those who seek to restore silver to its former status as a money metal are attempting to establish a dishonest dollar in the currency of our country.

The class of avowed gold monometallists is small in numbers, but when we remember that they overturned the coinage system of the country twenty-two years ago without the open aid of any political party, and that in spite of the platform declarations of the principal political parties of the country and the able efforts of influential public men of all parties to the contrary, they have maintained their single standard ever since, we must admit that they form an influential class. This is, in part at least, because their efforts are strengthened by another class, who assist in making bimetallic platforms, who make earnest declarations in favor of the double standard of gold and silver, but who when pressed to action take refuge in the dilatory policy of waiting for international action among the leading commercial nations of the world.

In the early part of my remarks I stated that the great body of the American people are bimetallists, and so far as words and declarations go, I think I have proved my assertion. But words are not always used in exactly the same meaning, and sometimes an adroit reasoner, who desires to guide public thought and action in the direction where his political and financial interests lie, rather than to develop the truth, will endeavor to gain an advantage by using terms in a misleading sense. Thus the word "bimetallism" is often used as if it meant merely the use of coins composed of two different metals in a system of coinage. As nickel and copper are used in our mintage, as well as gold and silver, it is manifest that if this were the correct use of the word our system would properly be designated as quadrimetallic rather than bimetallic. I use bimetallism as meaning a system which employs coins of two metals as standard money at a fixed ratio, the two constituting a medium to which all obligations, promises, and liabilities may be reduced, each being a measure of values as well as a medium of circulation, and a bimetallist is one who favors such a system.

Mr. President, I understand that a recess is to be taken at 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Such the Chair understands to have been the unanimous agreement of the Senate.

Mr. PASCO. As that hour has nearly arrived, and as I have reached an appropriate point in my remarks, I prefer to yield now and to go on this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 3 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.). If there be no objection, the Senate will take a recess under the unanimous agreement of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senate takes a recess until 7:30 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m.; and Mr. HARRIS resumed the chair as Presiding Officer.

AMENDMENT TO PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the pension appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the regular order will be proceeded with, upon which the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] is entitled to the floor.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, a fair analysis of the Democratic and Republican platforms of 1892 will, I think, demonstrate that both parties have pledged themselves to such a use of gold and silver in the national coinage; and the true meaning of the statutory declaration embodied in the law of 1893 repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law is in harmony with the same view.

The Republicans—

> Commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

No such conference would be necessary to settle the value of metal to be used in making subsidiary coins, for their value depends upon the statutory obligations of the country which issues them and not upon the size or weight or shape of the coins, or the value or fineness of the material of which they are composed.

The establishment of a parity between gold and silver is to form a basis of coinage in which coins of the same denomination and of different metals are to be of equal intrinsic value, without reference to any governmental pledge, so that they may be used interchangeably in the business affairs of our own people and in their commercial transactions with other nations. The purpose, then, of these international conferences was to reendow silver with all the functions of perfect money. But another clause in the platform shows that the party did not propose to wait longer for foreign action to restore bimetallism. It is declared that the American people favor it "from tradition and interest," and that the use of the two metals as standard money on a parity of values is to be accomplished by provisions to be determined by legislation. History as well as tradition teaches us that bimetallism in America has meant something more than the use of two metals in a system of coinage, one of full money functions, the other subsidiary. The platform can only mean the true bimetallism which uses the two coins on equal terms at a just ratio. If this were doubtful the doubt would disappear when we find the further declaration in favor of both gold and silver as a standard money.

The Democratic platform holds "to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country," not to the use of one as a standard and the other as inferior and subsidiary. It holds to the coinage of both without discriminating against either metal, therefore bullion holders are entitled to like privileges whether they carry the yellow or the white metal to the mint. The former must, under existing law, be coined for the owner, and this has been the owner's right ever since the establishment of the mint; the owner of silver had the same right prior to 1873, and the manifest meaning of the platform declaration is to revive and renew this right. The further pledge is to restore this privilege to the owner of silver of having it coined "without charge for mintage," which can mean nothing else than free coinage. Only one thing is left unsettled—the ratio; and like the Republican platform, it points to legislation as one of the means by which a parity between the two metals is to be established, and mentions also the other avenue to the desired result, by an international agreement, which has been thrice attempted in vain.

The law repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act and setting forth the policy of the United States with respect to its currency also declares in favor of gold and silver as standard money. This statutory declaration, which became a law by the President's approval on the 1st day of November, 1893, is as follows:

> And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

This section of the statute received the support and vote of every Senator on both sides of the Chamber who is opposing the pending amendment, and the law of which it forms a part was approved by the President.

The policy to which the Government pledged itself in this act was manifestly not to maintain the present silver dollar at its face value by any new legislation. Though its value as a piece of metal changes from day to day, according to the fluctuations of the market, and though the metal it contains has never been worth a dollar since the act of 1878 was passed, and at times has been worth less than half that amount, there has never been any depreciation in the value of the coined dollar. The fiat of the Government and the pledge and promise contained in the law as it existed when this act of 1893 was passed have been sufficient to maintain the coin at its face value, notwithstanding its light weight and the inferior market price of the metal of which it is composed. There was no inconvenience of this sort to be remedied by legislation, and there was another end in view when Congress made this declaration of the financial policy of the United States, which is plainly disclosed in the act.

The policy of the Government is declared to be to coin money of both metals of equal intrinsic value. When this is done, the market value of the metal contained in a gold dollar and the market value of the metal contained in the silver dollar will be the same, and such a system will maintain the equal power of every dollar coined by the United States, whether in the markets of the country or in the discharge of public and private obligations, and the paper obligations issued by the Government resting upon this broad and double basis will pass current as a part of the circulating medium as readily as the coins in which it is redeemable.

The statutory pledge of the Government to establish such a safe system of bimetallism as will give the people gold and silver dollars not equal merely in exchangeable value by the fiat and pledge of the Government, but equal and self-sustaining because of the equality in commercial value of the material of which they are composed, is, like the platform pledges of the two great parties, still unfulfilled. The same two avenues by which the country is to return to the bimetallic system are indicated in the law as in the platforms, legislation, and the thrice-tried international conference. The former only is entirely within our control, and it is nowhere suggested in platform or law that the legislative avenue is impassable. The Republican party came into power in 1888 holding forth the promise of a change, but they gave the country only a modification and extension of the silver-purchasing policy, and for this and other causes they lost the confidence of the people. The Democrats in 1892 denounced this Republican legislation as a cowardly makeshift, promised the people a dollar unit of both metals of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value. But this cowardly makeshift is still the law of the land, and the subsidiary silver dollar whose intrinsic value is but half that of its gold namesake is a lawful coin, retaining its exchangeable value because of the pledge of the Government.

I think I have clearly shown that these platform and statutory declarations all point to the restoration of a bimetallic system of money, in which silver shall be restored to the place it occupied in our mintage prior to 1873 on equal terms with gold, which means the free and unlimited coinage of both metals as the remedy for the financial ills of the country.

The demands of the people in favor of the restoration of their constitutional money have reached the ears of their delegates in these national conventions, as they have assembled every four years and have found expression in these platforms, but without any practical results thus far. The effects of the demonetization continue to bear disastrously upon the country. The prices of our staple products and the wages of our agricultural laborers have been tending downward, and no other satisfactory explanation has been given for the decline than the destruction of a large part of the standard money and the resulting increase in value of the residue, which increase is manifest in its larger purchasing power.

The monometallist sometimes points to a temporary improvement in prices to refute the opinion that this is an influential cause of shrinking values, but an examination of the causes of an improved market will show that other elements of value have acted favorably, and it has never been claimed that the reduction of our money system to a gold basis is the sole cause of the shrinkage in prices. An enlarged demand or a diminished supply will easily account for a temporary improvement; and thus a partial failure in crops, drought, blight, mildew, or the bollworm may temporarily neutralize the palsying effect of an insufficient and shrinking basis upon which the currency of the country rests, and the fortunate ones who escape the full effects of the calamity reap a benefit from its results.

The disastrous effects of the change to a monometallic basis are felt in another direction. As the remaining metal increases in purchasing power the value of all long-time obligations increases, and the debtor finds his burdens constantly growing larger. Public as well as private obligations are thus affected, and a heavier drain is made upon the resources of cities, counties, States, and the whole country to meet the interest and principal of bonds which have to be paid by taxation upon the labor and industry and resources of the citizen.

It would take three times as much cotton to pay a debt at the average price in New York of the crop of 1894 to 1895 as at the price of the crop of 1872 to 1873, the last crop marketed before the demonetization of silver, and the general tendency of the market has been downward since that year. The last crop has not been fully marketed, and the statistics will not be made up for a few months. They will show an improvement upon the price of last year, caused by a bad crop year and a short crop, and, as I have already said, the amount of the supply is an element in settling the price of a commodity.

But this monometallic system is resulting in another serious burden upon the American people. As the insufficiency of the supply of gold to form a basis for the business of the commercial nations becomes more and more apparent, it is sought for with increased eagerness and industry, and it tends toward the creditor nations and the money kings of the world. The facility with which our supply can be reduced and exhausted under the regulations and practice of the Treasury Department has encouraged the gold speculators to make frequent and continuous raids upon the stock kept by the Government, and a profit is made by exporting it. From 1889 to 1895 gold coin and bullion to the amount of $465,574,843 was sent abroad.

The resumption act of January 14, 1875, provided for the redemption in coin of the legal-tender notes then outstanding when presented for that purpose at the office of the assistant treasurer in New York in sums of $50. The Sherman law of 1890 provided for the redemption in gold or silver coin at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury notes issued under it for the purchase of silver bullion. But there was added to this provision a declaration that it was the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the existing ratio of 16 to 1 or such ratio as might be thereafter provided by law. This law was passed during the Administration of President Harrison, and this declaration has been treated by the Secretary of the Treasury and his successor under the present Administration as a legislative mandate to redeem the Treasury notes as well as the legal-tender notes in gold whenever the holders of these obligations presented them and demanded gold coin from the Treasury.

But this declaration was coupled with no provision for a constant supply of gold to carry it into effect, and a fund which has been kept in the Treasury ever since the passage of the resumption act of January 14, 1875, under a construction of that act has been resorted to for the redemption of these obligations when presented.

As a matter of fact, this fund, which is constantly referred to and designated as a reserve fund and is supposed to contain $100,000,000, has never had a separate existence, and its amount has constantly been changing. In 1877 and 1878 the Secretary of the Treasury sold United States bonds for resumption purposes to the amount of $75,500,000, and the proceeds were deposited with the general cash in the Treasury; this seems to have been the origin of the so-called fund, and ever since the Secretary has endeavored to keep a surplus of gold in the Treasury as nearly as possible to this amount.

Under the discretion granted to the Secretary and already referred to, he has the authority to coin the silver bullion purchased with the Treasury notes authorized by the Sherman law and to use this coin in redeeming them, but he has deemed it his duty to redeem the notes in the coin called for by the holders of the notes because the policy of the Government declared in the act to keep the two metals at a parity could, in his opinion, only be thus maintained. It would seem that the same reasoning upon which this opinion rests requires the silver certificates also to be redeemed in gold, but up to the present time this has not been done.

The present Secretary in a recent communication to the Senate, dated January 11, 1896, gives the following history of this fund:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution dated the 3d instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate if the sum of $100,000,000, or any part thereof, has at any time since the establishment of the so-called gold reserve been actually segregated or set apart from the other currency or money in the Treasury Department, in gold coin, or gold coin and gold certificates, or either, for the redemption of the legal-tender notes and different forms of paper money of the Government; and when and by what act of Congress, giving the title of the act and the date of its approval, said so-called gold reserve was established, and if not established by act of Congress, state by what authority, if any, it was established."

In reply thereto the Senate is respectfully informed that at no time since the establishment of the so-called gold reserve has the sum of $100,000,000, or any sum, been segregated or set apart from the general cash in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the United States, or for the redemption of any other form of paper money for which the United States is liable. There is no provision of law requiring a separate fund or separate account to be kept, and all moneys received into the Treasury, from whatever source, are deposited in the general cash. The fund for the redemption of United States notes was accumulated under authority of the act of January 14, 1875, which directed the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for such redemption on the 1st day of January, 1879. No specific sum was prescribed, but the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to use the surplus revenues, from time to time to sell certain descriptions of bonds to an extent necessary to carry the act into full effect.

In the exercise of the discretion thus conferred upon him the Secretary sold for resumption purposes in 1877 and 1878 United States 4 per cent and 4½ per cent bonds to the amount of $95,500,000 and deposited the proceeds, $96,000,000 in gold, in the general cash in the Treasury. This, with other gold which had been received as surplus revenue, constituted the fund prepared and provided by the Secretary of the Treasury for the redemption directed in the act of January 14, 1875.

The existence of the reserve fund was generally recognized from the time of its establishment, as above stated, and one of the measures adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent its unnecessary depletion was the discontinuance of the issue of the gold certificates authorized by the act of March 3, 1863. This act authorized but did not direct such issue.

Some inconvenience resulted from this discontinuance, and by section 12 of the bank act of July 12, 1882, the Secretary was authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion and to issue certificates therefor; but it was provided "that the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000."

No other reference to the reserve fund is contained in the laws of the United States.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Under this view of his duty the Secretary redeems in gold, whenever it is demanded, the legal-tender and Treasury notes that are presented to him, and whenever this so-called reserve fund is reduced to what is regarded as the danger point United States bonds are sold for gold and the supply of the Government is replenished, to be again reduced, when the same or other notes are again presented with a demand for their redemption, and by this never-ending process, appropriately denominated an endless chain, the gold is kept constantly flowing into and out of the Treasury without accomplishing any permanent results. The President is engaged in a task as hopeless as the labor of Sisyphus. The bonded debt of the country has been increased to the amount of about $162,000,000 in less than three years, to keep up this system of redemption, and a further increase of $100,000,000 is now being provided for. The interest upon this new indebtedness will be an additional annual burden of more than $10,000,000 upon the taxpayers of the country, and the only method of escape from a constant increase of this burden that is proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury is to retire the legal-tender notes and leave the circulation to the banks, thus shifting the troublesome and costly work of redemption upon these institutions, and largely increasing the interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government.

The adoption of this policy would deprive the people of a safe and useful circulating medium, contract the currency to an extent that would threaten universal bankruptcy, give the banking corporations the dangerous power of regulating and controlling the volume of money in circulation, and add $500,000,000 to our bonded indebtedness.

The House has declined to adopt this policy and has offered a plan of relief comprised in two bills.

The one before us continues the bond policy and authorizes the issue of 3 per cent bonds from time to time to an amount limited only by the discretion of the Secretary, payable in coin, the proceeds to be used only for the redemption of the legal-tender notes. There is no provision that they are to be sold for gold, and the Secretary is left to exercise the implied authority thus to sell them under which he has heretofore acted with reference to the recent issues of bonds. The proceeds of these bonds are to be segregated from the other funds in the Treasury and are to constitute a reserve fund in fact and not merely in name.

The legal-tender notes may be reissued when redeemed with the gold thus obtained, but the bill does not provide any way of getting them into circulation. As long as gold is regarded as more valuable than paper money and is sought after by the redemption process as a means of profit and gain there will be no large demand for their reissue in exchange for gold, and they must be withheld from circulation and be allowed to accumulate and increase in the Treasury and be as effectually retired and withdrawn from the active business of the country as if the law provided for and directed their cancellation. Thus the law will enable the Secretary to accomplish his plan of retiring the legal-tender notes indirectly, while in terms it forbids their retirement.

The second section provides certificates of indebtedness drawing 3 per cent interest, to be issued by the Secretary to an amount not to exceed $50,000,000 to provide for any temporary deficiency, but as there is at present a surplus of about $120,000,000 besides the reserve fund and no deficiency is likely to arise within the next few years, the proposed legislation seems premature, and at the present time altogether unnecessary.

It has been often alleged that the restoration of silver to its coinage privilege would have the effect to drive the gold out of the country, but the gold is leaving without waiting for such restoration, and at a time when legislation to bring about such action is known to be impossible. If this exodus of gold is adverse to our business interests, it must be remembered that it has come to us under the existing system of coinage. Gold, as a circulating medium, has already disappeared in ordinary business operations, both in the form of coin and of gold certificates. It is rarely now presented, even at the custom-houses, in payment of import duties. It is controlled mainly by bankers and financiers, individually and combined in syndicates, and comparatively a few men, working together with a common purpose in view, can control its movements. As long as they find it profitable to move American gold to Europe and to furnish our Treasury with a new supply for a valuable consideration, the present movements will continue; and there ought to be some better remedy than a surrender of our legal-tender circulation or a continuous increase of our bonded indebtedness.

Even if the legal-tender notes should be retired by direct legislation or indirectly by the operation of the bill as it came from the House, what assurance have we that the Secretary of the Treasury or some successor will not construe the parity declaration of the Sherman law as a mandate to redeem the silver certificates in gold, and thus continue the movement of the endless chain till they, too, are retired and the bonded indebtedness is still further increased? Practically all the business of the people is now carried on in these certificates and the silver coin which they represent. The Government pays them out for salaries, pensions, and in discharge of its ordinary business obligations; the gold is reserved for those who keep the endless chain in motion. If the holders of the silver certificates were to follow the course marked out by the holders of the legal-tender notes and demand that their parity with gold obligations be maintained in the same manner that the gold value of Treasury notes is demonstrated, the reserve would melt like snow in summer if the Secretary continued the present governmental policy, and consistency would require its continuance.

The true remedy for the existing condition of our currency is a return to bimetallism. The coinage will then rest upon a foundation of gold and silver dollars equal in intrinsic and exchangeable value, and with this broad basis of support the paper money of the Government, redeemable in either coin, will cease to be a cause of embarrassment. I shall vote for the Senate amendment to the bill, in the hope that we can return to the former ratio of 16 to 1 with safety. I do not feel that that particular ratio is sacred, and if, after a careful investigation of the question of ratio and parity, it should seem to be manifest that the French ratio of 15½ to 1, or some other ratio that placed the value of silver lower would secure a safer system of bimetallism, I would prefer such ratio. I regret that those who profess a belief in bimetallism and who have fought the battles of Democracy upon the platforms to which I have already called attention, and who regard the committee amendment as unsafe, do not offer us a better plan, in harmony with Democratic precedents and party promises. When it becomes manifest that the platform pledges made to the people upon this subject by all political parties are to be redeemed, the question of ratio will not be in the way of their fulfillment. Meanwhile I shall continue my efforts to reach bimetallism by acting with those who believe that the parity of the two metals can be maintained in the future at 16 to 1 as it was in the past.

This system of free coinage of gold and silver without limit or restriction as to amount prevailed from 1792 to 1873, a period of eighty-one years. The ratio fixed first at 15 to 1 continued till 1834. During this period the European coinage ratio was 15½ to 1, and it would have been best to have established the American coinage of the two precious metals upon this same ratio. While this ratio continued from 1792 to 1834, the bullion value of the two metals varied from 15 in 1793 to 16.25 in 1813, as shown in the tables of A. Sootbeer, a statistician of recognized authority. The average ratio of the bullion values for the forty-two years was 15.6.

The ratio was changed in the United States in 1834 by reducing the amount of gold in the coins, and a ratio of 16 to 1 was established, going as far below the European ratio as the act of 1792 was above that ratio. Under this system, until the demonetization of silver in 1873, a period of thirty-nine years, the two metals varied from 15.19 in 1859 to 15.93 in 1843. The average ratio was 15.59. These figures indicate that whatever confusion and inconvenience prevailed in our coinage system was caused by our establishing a ratio which did not agree with that in use by other commercial nations, and made silver more valuable abroad than in the United States. At the time of the demonetization of silver in 1873 there had been no decline below the face value of that metal. The value of a silver dollar in gold in 1872 was $1.0225, as shown in a table prepared from the records of the mint. During 1873 it fell to $1.0046. The decline since then has been steady and continuous, as indicated by the following figures, which give its bullion value in different years:

1880	.886	1892	.604

Silver was demonetized in England in 1816, but notwithstanding the commercial interests of that country and her vast foreign trade, her action seems to have produced but little effect upon our coinage, and for fifty-seven years after this action our mint was open to the coinage of silver without disturbance to the business interests of the country. This experience of eighty-one years, in war and in peace, with and without the cooperation of England, during periods of financial disaster and panic as well as during periods of prosperity, shows that some reasons existed for demonetization that were not made known to the people when the act of demonetization was passed.

Silver and gold had been coined at our mints on equal terms during all this period, and the widest variation of values was 1½ cents, and with the omission of two years the variation had been but 1 cent. Even the discoveries of gold in California and Australia and the opening of the rich silver mines in the West did not cause any sudden change of ratio or materially affect our monetary system. But immediately after silver lost its money function and its coinage was discontinued, except as subsidiary money, as nickel and copper are coined, its value began to diminish.

The only apparent reason for the beginning of this decline was the loss of the money function. The restoration of this function will manifestly increase its value and those who maintain that it will at once regain its former value may be correct. Experience teaches that the effect will be to give a comparatively steady value to silver when it ceases to be a mere commodity, and the increment in its price caused by its recognition at the mints as a money metal will soon appear. If the result shows that some different ratio from that now proposed is required to keep coins of both metals in circulation on equal terms, such ratio should be ultimately adopted.

Among the many charges which are being constantly made by those who use their influence to continue the gold standard is that the movement in favor of the restoration of silver to its mint privileges is solely in the interest of owners of silver mines. The people in the State which I have the honor in part to represent and in the section of country where my home is own no silver mines and have no pecuniary interest in the results of silver mining. Their interest in silver is the general benefit that will come to the people of the United States by its use as standard money so that the business of the whole country may rest upon a surer and broader basis. The profit that may come to mine owners is incidental; it might be urged that owners of gold mines will be benefited by a continuance of the monometallic system. But this great question is not to be decided by paltry considerations of this character. If it were I might call attention to the vast amount of silver belonging to the people of the United States, warehoused in the Treasury under the operation of the silver-purchasing laws, which would get the benefit of an increment to its value by the restoration of its money function.

The ultimate settlement of this great question must be upon the foundation of right and justice. The creditor class at home and abroad who, under the present system, see the long-time obligations which belong to them grow more and more valuable as the years roll on without any new consideration passing from them to their unfortunate debtors, earnestly desire its continuance, and insolently assail those who insist upon a return to the double standard and a restoration of silver to its mint privileges on equal terms with gold without discrimination against either metal as impracticable if not dishonest. They affect to believe that the people have lost interest in the subject and have accepted the single gold standard as the best possible solution of the question. They attempt to belittle those who are standing faithfully by the platform obligations of their party and their pledges to the people whom they represent, and falsely charge that they are acting against the wishes and interests of the people of their States. They threaten to use their power and wealth and influence in the States where such Senators reside to defeat their reelection if they do not "come out hearty and strong" for what they are pleased to denominate "sound money."

The Democrats of Florida fought out the campaign of 1892, one of the results of which was my reelection as a member of this body, upon the national platform of the party which I have already recited and analyzed and upon a State platform one plank of which expressly reaffirmed the national platform of 1888 and another plank demanded "the unlimited coinage of silver." During the campaign of 1894 I went from county to county to address the people, as far as I had time and opportunity after the adjournment of Congress, and told them what I had done here during the contest over the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and my course was everywhere sustained and indorsed. The vast majority of the people of the State, without respect to party affiliations, are bimetallists and favor the free coinage of silver on such a ratio as is just and fair. Newspaper writers in other States who allege to the contrary are attempting to deceive their readers or are not properly informed as to the views and sentiments of our people upon the subject.

Mr. President, they who believe in a true system of bimetallism, in which gold and silver are admitted to free mintage on equal terms, are as honest as those claim to be who have fastened gold monometallism upon the country, and who are striving for its perpetuation. It is with this feeling of respect for one another that the subject is generally discussed upon this floor, and it will be well for the interests of the whole country to realize that the dividing line between those who favor both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and those who favor gold alone as the standard is not a line which separates honesty and dishonesty. The obligations of the Government should be carried out according to their true meaning and effect, and they will be, but a system which has been tried for twenty-two years and more and has resulted disastrously to our people, particularly to our large agricultural interests, ought to be abandoned and the gold and silver coinage which was authorized by the Constitution and the early legislation of the country should be restored. History and experience have demonstrated the wisdom of the early fathers in establishing it, and we have abundant reason to believe that business activity and commercial prosperity will follow its restoration.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me a moment, that I may offer an amendment?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. PALMER to the substitute reported by the Finance Committee to House bill No. 2904.

Amend the bill by adding after the words "seventy-eight," in line 11 of page 5 of the bill, the following:

"But it is the declared policy of the United States to maintain the parity between the gold coinage of 25$\frac{8}{10}$ of standard gold and the dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver, authorized to be coined by the first section of this act, and to maintain the equal power of the said silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver and the gold dollar of 25$\frac{8}{10}$ grains of standard gold in the markets and in the payment of debts. And the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to exercise the discretion given to him by the fourth section of this act, so as, in his judgment, to best advance and promote the policy hereinbefore declared."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, with more money in the Treasury than is necessary to defray current expenses and meet the obligations of the Government, but with a financial situation that is a constant menace to the gold reserve, the President asks for legislation to relieve the country from this abnormal state of affairs. He points to the greenbacks and the Treasury notes as the source of danger, and recommends their retirement and their funding into bonds to form the basis of a currency adequate, safe, and elastic.

The House responds by a bill to increase revenue, and another to authorize emergency 3 per cent Treasury bonds, not exceeding $50,000,000.

The Senate Finance Committee responds by a free silver coinage bill at 16 to 1.

This is the situation. From the persistence with which the silver advocates have pushed their free-coinage scheme, and the unwavering fidelity and ability with which they have maintained it, in and out of Congress, no one can doubt their sincerity; but can we say the same of the Republicans who claim to stand for sound money?

The act of 1875 provided for the resumption of specie payment and the redemption of the greenbacks.

The act of 1878 prohibited the final redemption of the greenbacks not then redeemed, and commanded the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue them. The language is mandatory. It is as follows:

When any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury, under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and kept again in circulation.

Yet the veteran Senator from Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, tells us, in his speech delivered in the Senate on January 3, the language of the act is permissive; in other words, the Secretary may reissue them, but he need not. He may take them into the Treasury, and may keep them there for an indefinite period. Perhaps ingenuity can construe language against itself, but it is difficult to construe a Senator against himself. These difficult feats have nearly been accomplished by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who with graceful agility has not only jumped over the statute, but has practically jumped over his own construction of it.

The amount of greenbacks redeemed and reissued since the act of 1878 shows conclusively that the Senator from Ohio is wrong by the statute and wrong by his own construction. Hear him:

A note redeemed by coin is in the Treasury and subject to the same law as if received for taxes or a bank note redeemed by the corporation issuing it. Authority to reissue does not depend on the mode in which it is returned to the Treasury.—Report of Secretary Sherman of 1877.

Now, when notes are in the Treasury and the Secretary can reissue them, notwithstanding their mode of entrance, the Senator knows that the dues of the Government to its creditors compel the reissue and that the notes can not, in the nature of things, remain piled up there. To do so would be, first, a violation of law, and, second, a violation of sound policy. It would illegally contract the currency and bring about surreptitiously and illegally a retirement of notes which the present law requires to be constantly kept in circulation. Besides, the constant and uninterrupted practice of each Secretary of the Treasury has been to reissue the greenbacks, which would of itself, were the language of the statute ambiguous, form a precedent for the action of the present Secretary.

In the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in the Senate on the 22d instant, he said:

If the Senator will get up here and say that in his judgment the maintenance of the gold standard and the maintenance of $100,000,000 in the reserve is compensation for what we suffer in the issuing of from two to three hundred million dollars a year of bonds, that will be all right; we shall know when to meet it. What I complain of is that on this side of the Chamber the majority of the Republicans are absolutely without a policy. You have not got any and you will not have one now. You dare not redeem the greenbacks; that you know would afford you relief. You dare not go before the public in 1896 with your candidate on that kind of a platform; you know where you would land. You would be landed where the Democrats were landed at the last election and where they expect to be landed now if we do not make some such blunder as that. You are afraid to do that. A majority of the gold men in this Chamber believe it ought to be done. You are in sympathy with the President, in my judgment, on that point, and if you are going to maintain the gold standard I repeat what I said before, that is the logical and only way out of it, unless you are willing to increase the public debt just as long as men will buy bonds at 3 per cent, or 5 per cent, or any other rate per cent.

This is the deliberate attack of a Republican Senator, of great and acknowledged ability, on the cowardly attitude of the reputed sound-money Republicans on the money question of the day.

Here is what a distinguished Democrat, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], says:

We are now engaged in an irrepressible financial conflict, a conflict as irrepressible as that which marched the armies of the North and South in the civil war. I trust that the arbitrament may not be by violence; I hope and believe that it will not be; but the conflict is just as irrepressible, and must be fought out to the last extremity between those of us who believe in retaining silver as standard money of redemption and those who believe in the single gold standard and the use of silver only as fractional coin. All attempts to evade this issue are impossible.

So it appears that from a leading silver Republican and a leading silver Democrat we have the square issue presented of keeping up the reserve, retiring greenbacks, or going to a silver basis.

The silver advocates conscientiously think that a silver basis is a financial heaven, where the streets of the New Jerusalem are paved with silver. The gold Democrats and gold Republicans think that such a heaven were worse than a financial hell. They want the streets of the New Jerusalem paved with gold, as the Scriptures have it.

Mr. President, the Republican party quailed before what it thought to be popular opposition when they passed the act of 1878, which partially destroyed the act of 1875. They quail now, when, after adopting another bad act, that of July, 1890, adding to the difficulties of maintaining the reserve and a gold standard, they refuse to do the only wise thing left to be done, namely, retire the greenbacks and provide an automatic bank issue based for redemption on the bonds into which the greenbacks must be funded.

There is a majority of Republicans ostensibly for sound money; there is a minority of Democrats in this body in favor of sound money, according to our vocabulary.

Every highly civilized nation on the face of the globe has funded its paper war debt except the United States. It hangs over our finances like a dark cloud filled with elements of destruction, ready to burst at any moment and devastate the country. In vain does the Republican party point to a deficiency of revenue and say with trembling lips, pile on more taxes and the reserve is safe; in vain do they say that the balance of trade is against us. The ceaseless working of an inexorable law assails the gold standard with destruction; the silent force of economic law brooks no trifling expedients to arrest its course; the fiat of economic law has long since gone forth, that depreciated paper and depreciated coin will drive out a superior coin; the fiat has gone forth from the same high authority that the fear of depreciation will have the same effect.

The expedient of the senior Senator from Ohio to pile up taxation, get the Treasury full of greenbacks, and hold them is simply to afford a refuge for the Republican party from the fierce attacks of the silver men and divert the issue to tariff.

The President is between two fires. To keep up the gold reserve he is compelled to issue bonds; to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes in silver is to go to a silver basis. It is infinitely better to keep our present standard than to incur the enormous ills of a silver basis. Every security, every debt, would be halved. The foundation of our vast financial and industrial fabric would be shaken.

To sell bonds means entailing a burden on the future; it may mean a useless volume of paper in the Treasury temporarily. But as the apprehension of a silver basis is the cause of our troubles, the wise and courageous policy of the President to maintain the reserve by the sale of bonds will inspire confidence, gold raiding will cease, and business resume its normal régime.

That gold withdrawals from the Treasury is the effect of fear as to the soundness of the currency is shown from the periods of largest exports of gold corresponding with periods of apprehension and alarm.

In 1892 the excess of exports of gold over imports was $495,873. The excess of exports of merchandise over imports for the same year was $202,875,686. In 1893 the excess of exports of gold over imports was $87,506,463. The excess of imports of merchandise over export swas $18,737,728. In 1894 the excess of the exports of gold over imports was $4,528,942. The excess of exports of merchandise over imports was $237,145,950.

So it appears that with the balance of trade in our favor for three years to the extent of $411,283,908, there was an export of gold over import for the same period of $92,531,278.

These figures are taken from the Statistical Abstract for 1894. This puts to flight the theory of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the cause of financial troubles is the balance of trade being against us for the last few years.

Gold ought to have been imported to settle this balance, if our gold standard were not constantly threatened.

There is no danger of contracting the currency by getting all the greenbacks and Treasury notes into the Treasury. They would not be there long enough to work much damage.

If gold withdrawals go on, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] says, and bonds are sold to keep up the reserve, and there be a scarcity of currency in consequence, the demand for it for exchanges will be too great to allow the endless-chain operation to go on. If the currency is all congested in the Treasury, the custom dues and internal-revenue taxes will have to be paid in gold or silver, and so, as the gold is paid in, the Treasury can afford to redeem the greenbacks with it without impairing the reserve.

For preventing the basis of sixty-five billions of wealth to be seriously threatened and shrinking its value to the extent of all that portion of it represented by securities the people of this and future times will call President Cleveland a wise and patriotic man. He can only effect this by the sale of bonds, Congress refusing to pass laws to remove the source of danger.

The device of piling up taxes by more tariff when the Treasury is threatened with a plethora of paper money is like pouring water in a vessel already full.

Mr. President, is the fear well founded that the silver forces are strong enough to bring about a silver basis?

No one can say that there is not some remote danger of such a result, for the organization, strength, and numbers of the silver movement are acknowledged of all men.

While I think that the free coinage of silver is fraught with more evils than imagination can picture, more than ever it could or did bring in any period or in any country, there is a legion of honest, intelligent men who think just the opposite.

I fondly hoped that the discussion which has gone on in Congress, on the hustings, in the press, in lecture rooms, and in periodicals, would ere this have dispelled the delusions which have captured the judgment of a large portion of our people.

I set up no superior knowledge, I claim no infallibility, but with the best light that my intellect furnishes I firmly adhere to the present standard of our country; the standard of the civilized commercial world; the gold standard, with silver as subsidiary money, with the full legal-tender quality it now has, and to the amount now existing.

The free-coinage advocates hold that the gold standard adopted by statute in 1873 cut off half of the metallic money of the United States, and that its adoption by Europe cut off half of the metallic money of the world; they hold that silver at a fixed ratio had circulated pari passu with gold, until its "taking off," for over four hundred years; that the mint rates always regulated and controlled the commercial rates, and will always do so. They hold that "cutting off" silver left the money function on gold alone, which consequently appreciated, has appreciated ever since, and will always appreciate, as the supply is unequal to the demand.

They aver stoutly that there was and is a conspiracy of the money power in behalf of gold and against silver, whereby the poor are made poorer and the rich richer; that prices have gone down to starvation figures, and that the people mourn for silver as Rachel mourned for her children. They draw such dreadful pictures of all gold countries, ground beneath the heel of a remorseless gold despotism, as to make many of them sigh for the silver solitudes of Mexico and the silver glories of Japan and Venezuela.

A distinguished advocate of silver in this body, quoting the status of France as a shining example of alleged bimetallism, says—I quote from Senator JONES of Arkansas in a late speech:

> In the June number of the North American Review the great English statistician, Mulhall, said:
> "If we take a survey of mankind in ancient or modern times as regards the physical, mechanical, and intellectual force of nations we find nothing to compare with the United States in this present year of 1895. At the same time we see that the wealth of the American people surpasses that of any other nation past or present.
> "He states the energy or our working power to compare with that of France as 129,306 to 34,580, our producing capacity as 475 to 115, and he says that the 'merchandise transported in the United States is shown by official returns to be double the amount of the land carriage (at least by rail) of all the other nations of the earth collectively.' We are known to be the largest consumers of the necessaries as well as the luxuries of life on the earth, and of course our internal commerce as well as our external commerce must be enormously large. We have 41,000,000 of instructed citizens, and spend a hundred and fifty-six millions on schools, against thirty-one millions in France. As France successfully maintained a 'rated equivalence' at 15½ to 1 for seventy years, may we not reasonably anticipate that if we should declare in favor of bimetallism that we could easily accomplish our purpose; that we are powerful enough to keep the ratio of 16 to 1 prevalent, a lower rate than that of France?"

If the United States, a gold country, is nearly three and three-fourth times the working power of silver France (as alleged), and our producing capacity four times as much, has gold impaired our wealth or destroyed our greatness? In every walk of life, from the lowest to the highest, in comfort, in property, in advancement, in wages, and in education, we are far ahead of France. Why adopt her late silver policy?

The example of France is adduced to show that if a weaker nation like France, single handed, kept up a double standard for seventy years, why not we in the full zenith of our power?

France, single handed, kept up for seventy years a double standard at 15½ to 1, therefore we single handed can keep up one at 16 to 1.

A simple question will put his interrogation to shame; why does not France keep on with her 15½ to 1 standard? If it was good for seventy years, why not good forever?

France has closed her mints to silver. France is supposed to know her own policy better than any other nation can know it. "Perfide Albion" had the gold standard; and it is not likely that France became a victim to the policy of her rival, nor that the money power threw its coils over the wily Frenchmen.

Mr. President, the whole difficulty lies in assuming that governments can regulate the exchangeable value of commodities. Metallic money is a commodity like anything else that human beings wish to have and enjoy, for use, for pleasure, for convenience, or to gratify any desire—physical or intellectual.

The value of any commodity lies in comparison with some other commodity; this is called exchangeable value.

Money is a device resorted to from the difficulty of bartering what one person has for something that another has; barter springs from the diversity of pursuits among men; in a primitive condition of society, when everybody makes what he wants, there is no exchange; as soon as a man is confined to producing one or a few articles, he can only satisfy his wants by procuring what others produce, by exchanging his surplus for theirs; money therefore comes into play. Governments never made money, nor can they.

When a common denominator of values is introduced among men the common denominator must, by comparison, have an exchangeable value equal to everything that it exchanges for. The commodity itself must be valuable; it must have what is called, for want of a better term, intrinsic value; it must possess those qualities which mankind attribute to it, of being equal to whatever it is given for.

Now, as value springs from the estimate that each party to an exchange puts on his own and the commodity offered for it, it follows that the exchange is an individual act, springing from individual estimate. This estimate is an intellectual process, and until governments possess the power of substituting despotic will for the free and independent action of the brain of the citizen, governments can not fix upon any commodity, be it gold, silver, copper, wheat, corn, or cotton, any value whatever.

It is related in history that the Emperor Charles V, in his retirement, after abdicating the throne, amused himself by regulating watches. He could never make two watches keep exactly the same time.

"If I can not make two watches go alike," said he, "surely I can not make two persons think alike."

I quote from memory, without the history of Charles V before me, and use my own language to convey the idea of the historian. He might have said: "If two persons will seldom place the same value upon any two commodities, how can kingly authority step in and prescribe to either what one or both of the commodities should be worth?"

When once the idea is firmly grasped that metallic money is a commodity; that when it is offered in exchange it is subject to the same mental process as if it were another commodity; that if it is bad money, or depreciated, it will exchange for less of other commodities than good money will; then we are on the road to a clear perception of the economic laws to which it is subject.

Metallic money has no other function than to effect exchange and to furnish a common measure of values, and it enjoys these functions from the voluntary and wholy independent action of the parties to an exchange. In the genesis of money it is clear that money is used, ex necessitate, before govermental action comes in to fix its weight and fineness and attest its genuineness.

Primitive people, with few exchanges, use as media of exchange various commodities. Cows, tobacco, wampum belts, bits of compressed tea, shells, and hides have been used, as history tells us, by people in a rude state of society; then came the metals, iron and copper first, then silver and gold.

When Abraham bought the field of Machpelah for a burying ground for Sarah, his wife, he weighed out in the audience of the sons of Heth 400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant, as the purchase price. This is about as ancient a transaction as history records.

No governmental stamp, no 16 to 1, no superscription of any shepherd king, but simple silver weighed in the audience of the sons of Heth.

Had there been a law compelling copper and silver to circulate at 16 to 1, the trade would either have not been made for metal money or, if so, Abraham would have delivered unto Ephron about four chariot loads of copper for the cave of Machpelah.

It has always occurred to me, Mr. President, that if government can, in the face of a commercial ratio of 30 to 1, fix gold and silver at 16 to 1, they can circulate them evenly. Then why take such a costly material as silver and gold. Why not take paper? The Populists have the best end of the argument. If an artificial legal ratio can prevail against the commercial ratio, then government can make money out of the whole cloth. If they can impart value to silver, they can impart it to anything else.

The Populists favor 16 to 1, because it is a long step in the direction of fiat money. "Facilis descensus Averno." If we now go half-way, they hope in good time we will go the whole length of their doctrine.

But again, a law of universal application intervenes. If two commodities are at hand for a person to pay a debt in, he will always use the most inferior. Money is only useful when it is parted with; none but misers hoard it. It is currency, derived from the word "currens," it runs; and when a man has a chance of parting with one of two commodities in exchange for other commodities, he will always part with the least valuable of the commodities. Thus it is that bad money runs out good. It has done so in our country. It may be gold or silver that is bad, measured by the legal ratio as compared with the commercial ratio.

I confidently say that history affords no case when a metal underrated by the legal ratio as compared with the commercial ratio has not run away and overrated bad money, remained in circulation. The facts of our own history are well known on this point.

Again it is averred that it is true that metal money is a commodity. Money follows the law of supply and demand like other commodities, but the gold countries do not admit silver to free coinage; this lessens the demand for silver, and consequently its price falls. This is a fallacy. Governments can not make a demand for anything. The demand is an action of the mind. It springs from a desire to have money as an instrument of exchange or as a standard of value. Government can no more make demand than it can make the bargain which springs from it.

Now, when a commodity presents itself to human intelligence as a common denominator of all other values and as a medium of exchange, that intelligence immediately compares it with another commodity, presented for the same purpose. As attributes of commodities change from changing conditions and changing desires, this comparison is not inflexible and stationary, but is constantly fluctuating.

When silver presents itself as a medium of exchange and a measure of value, comparisons are immediately instituted among men as to how it stands with gold. It may stand at one period at 10 to 1, as it did generally during the Middle Ages, or 11 to 1 at another, or some other ratio at another. In fact, from 2 to 1 to 33 to 1 represents the varying but always lower value that silver bears to gold as civilization advances.

How did it start in 1792 at 15 to 1? Was it arbitrary? Hamilton is shown to have sedulously endeavored to get as near the commercial ratio as he could. He said:

> In establishing a proportion between the metals there seems to be an option of one or two things: To approach, as nearly as it can be ascertained, the mean or average proportion in what may be called the commercial world, or to retain that which now exists in the United States.

When the gold standard was effectually, though indirectly, adopted in 1837 and sanctioned and ratified by the report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in 1853, it was in pursuance of the wishes and interests of the people of the United States. It was distinctly asserted that the gold standard was best suited to our commercial and business interests and reflected the wishes of the people. Indeed, I confidently say that no standard can be imposed by government on a free people that they do not want. I do not believe that governments ever adopted a standard that was not in use long before government established it. It was so in England, according to Mr. Giffen, in 1816. It was so in the United States in 1834. The history of various commodities being used by the people as media of exchange before ever government intervened to establish the volume, weight, and fineness, of the material shows this to be so.

Government can despotically interfere in the voluntary action of individuals in selecting the best commodity their business needs require as a medium of exchange, and incidentally as a measure of value, but whenever they do so counter to the commercial needs of the people they inflict immeasurable wrong. History is full of sad examples of the wretchedness inflicted by kings in debasing the coin.

To attempt to give more value to silver than it has and force it upon creditors is of a piece with mediæval tyranny in forcing debased coins on an unwilling people. In 1873 there was neither gold nor silver in circulation. Inconvertible paper had driven them out of circulation. Brave silver hid, as well as cowardly gold.

Gold had theretofore been the standard in point of fact, and the act of 1873 simply put into law what had been recognized as fact, and what was honestly and intelligently wanted by the statesmen of the antebellum period.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I understood the Senator to say that silver was depreciating. Was it not at a premium at the time it was demonetized in 1873?

Mr. CAFFERY. It was.

Mr. DANIEL. Had not civilization advanced?

Mr. CAFFERY. It had.

Mr. DANIEL. Then how can the Senator be correct in his statement that as civilization advances silver goes down, when it was at a premium at a time when civilization was advancing?

Mr. CAFFERY. I referred to a general decline of silver. The gold discoveries of California and Australia and elsewhere had resulted in such an output of gold that temporarily the price of gold compared with silver had gone down, and silver was at a premium; and I say silver being at a premium in 1873 was no reason why gold should not have been adopted as the standard of value, because all experience up to that date, and all experience since that date, has shown that it possesses the quality of more invariable value, that it is less fluctuating in value, better adapted to the needs of extensive commerce, has greater value in less bulk, circulates the world over according to its bullion value, and, therefore, international as well as domestic exchanges can be better founded upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana if silver had not been stripped of its chief element by being proscribed as a money metal, although at a premium when it was so proscribed? Now, suppose cotton or wool had been prohibited to be manufactured into cloth, what would have been the effect upon the value of wool or cotton? Would you not have deprived each of those materials of its chief element of value, as you did deprive silver of its chief element of value? What would have been the effect upon those two materials?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, in the hypothesis supposed by the Senator from Tennessee cotton or wool would have been totally destroyed. I do not doubt the power of government to destroy arbitrarily and despotically, but I do claim that in a free government where there is no despotism government can not regulate the mind, can not regulate the estimate of commodities. The parallel, or the case put by the Senator from Tennessee, does not exist in regard to silver. It is not true to say that silver has been destroyed.

Mr. HARRIS. Was it not effectually destroyed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAFFERY. I shall yield in a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. Was silver not effectually destroyed when you by law demonetized it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator had yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana said he would yield in a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. CAFFERY. It is not true to say that silver was destroyed at all. It is true to say that since 1873 to date there has been more than fivefold the amount of silver coined into dollars in nineteen years than there was in the period elapsing from 1792 to 1873. If, therefore, silver has been used, how can anybody say that it has been destroyed? It has been used as money, it has performed the money function, and its value is by no jot or tittle impaired because it has been denied the power of money of ultimate redemption.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator stated that as civilization advanced silver went down. Will the Senator please state how that is consistent with the fact that from 1847 to 1850, when more gold was produced, the same people who are now warring upon silver led the crusade against gold and actually demonetized it? How is that consistent with the idea of the natural law, as claimed by the Senator from Louisiana, that carried silver down as civilization advanced?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think the Senator from Virginia has not correctly stated the facts. Gold has never been demonetized in Europe.

Mr. DANIEL. In one or two countries it has been.

Mr. CAFFERY. There is no country that I know of in Europe—of course the superior information and knowledge of other Senators on that point will correct me if I am wrong—that ever demonetized gold. At the period of the discovery of the gold mines of California, when there was a tremendous output of gold, gold being a commodity like everything else, a noted French writer of that period, Mr. Chevalier, in discussing the finances of France, thought perhaps it were best to demonetize gold, but it was never done.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Germany demonetized gold, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. And so did Holland in 1847.

Mr. CAFFERY. I stand corrected, then, and the question of the Senator from Virginia now needs an answer. Notwithstanding a temporary rise in the value of silver about the period of and after the discovery of gold in California, silver went to a premium as compared with gold, but, notwithstanding that, gold then held the supremacy. It holds its supremacy because it is a metal better suited to the needs of a large commerce. It is more valuable in less bulk. It is recognized everywhere as money. It is demonetized nowhere, and all along the line, from the inception of gold coinage, which was in Florence, I think, shortly after the commencement of enlightenment in Europe, about the time of the last Crusades, it has steadily advanced; and as commerce advanced, as the necessity of exchanges demanded a superior metal, gold has claimed and asserted its superiority.

So Hamilton adopted the commercial ratio. There was a difference in value between the metals then as now, and as ever will be, and the commercial ratio will always govern.

The silver advocates say, notwithstanding silver has been coined to the extent of $538,444,467 in the United States since 1873, and notwithstanding it is on a par with gold at 16 to 1, and is a legal tender for all debts, yet the law of supply and demand does not apply, because silver is a secondary money, a subsidiary coin, and does not possess the faculty of primary money, and therefore it is depreciated and drops constantly in the market.

The demand for metallic money is not regulated by its being primary or secondary, just so as it performs all the functions of money. The demand of the world was not cut off from silver in 1873. India had been for ages the great reservoir for all the surplus silver of the world; South America and Mexico were open to it, and yet we are told that, after using at home more in nineteen years by fivefold than we had for eighty years before, with the demand of the silver countries active, the demand for silver had been ruthlessly cut off.

Suppose that silver were to become suddenly more useful for arts, and the world product should be in demand, would the demand for it as necessary to the arts be less potent to give value than the demand for it as money?

In the language of Macaulay, it is not easy to perceive why a piece of metal fashioned as a disk should be more valuable than when fashioned as a spoon. Half the world was using silver as the primary money, the other half was using it as subsidiary money, and the United States was buying 50,000,000 ounces of it per annum.

A nickel passes for 5 cents. Everybody knows that there is not 5 cents in value to it. Why does it pass for 5 cents? Simply because it is necessary for the smallest exchanges, and it is legal tender up to 25 cents. Silver is depreciated about one-half, yet because it is necessary for certain exchanges larger than nickel exchanges, and because it is legal tender for any amount and is held to parity by the Government, it passes for 100 cents on the dollar.

Silver can be kept at par with gold by coining it in limited amounts, as the needs of trade require, and giving it legal-tender qualities to a small amount. We can hold all we have at par with full legal-tender quality.

The demand for silver as subsidiary coinage is sufficient to give it as much, if not more commercial value, than if it were admitted to free coinage at 16 to 1, for production would so increase the quantity that the ratio would drop lower and lower.

The modern improvements of deep and cheap mining would pour a constantly swelling stream of silver into the mints until inflation, with its spurious prosperity, would end in collapse and bankruptcy.

But the quantitative theory of money is exploded; the multiplication of transfers by private instrumentalities, checks, drafts, and notes has largely done away with the use of metallic money.

Exchanges of an enormous commerce can be carried on almost without metallic money. Its main use is to settle foreign balances by shipment of coin when rates of bills of exchange rule too high, and to form the reserves of banks, to redeem their paper issue and guarantee their deposits.

Here is a statement taken from the New York Times of a recent date:

THE CLEARING HOUSE.

The formal opening of the new home of the New York Clearing House yesterday was a notable event in the history of one of the most powerful, most remarkable, and most honorable institutions, not only in this city, but in the United States. Its original object, economy of time, labor, and the actual use of currency in effecting exchanges between the banks of the city, remains substantially the same as at the modest beginning. But not only have the operations connected with this object grown, with the passage of time and the development of the commerce of the country, to vast proportions, which a half century since would have been incredible if not inconceivable, but the associated bankers have found themselves gradually and naturally undertaking and successfully discharging functions of the utmost importance which were not dreamed of at the outset.

It is a mere commonplace of daily experience and observation that the perfect honesty and scrupulous accuracy of its transactions are the necessary condition of success, yet it may impress some not familiar with the business world to remark that while these transactions in forty-three years have reached eleven hundred billions of dollars, not one cent has been lost by misconduct or mischance. And the spirit that has produced this marvelous result has animated the clearing house at all times and under all conditions. It has always stood, as it stands now, for absolute honesty, for strict fairness, for sound banking, sound credit, and sound currency. At times of great distress and danger it has upheld honorable business men and saved them and the country from incalculable loss. And its vast and long service has been rendered with no authority and no aid from any government, often protecting the country from the evils of bad legislation and the errors of incompetent rulers. It is an example of what the freedom which is the essence of our institutions enables men to do.

This is an example of the potency of the modern vehicle of exchange. Money is a mere tool of exchange, says Bonamy Price, pages 7 and 8:

Coin is manufactured in order to effect a service; in other words, it is a tool; it does its work not by staying in its owner's hands, but by leaving them. No other conception of coin is rational or intelligible. It may be purchased long before it is used, as Napoleon I stored many millions of pounds at the Tuileries, in readiness for possible war, or as bankers pile up reserves to guard against the uncertainty of the payments of their debts, being suddenly demanded of them. But this changes nothing in the nature of money; it only indicates that it is occasionally wise, with money, as with other tools, to provide a stock of it beforehand, lest it may not be procurable at the moment when it is required for use. The truth always remains the same, that money is of no utility whatever, except when employed as a tool, that is, when it exercises its proper function by being got rid of in exchange for other property. It is a machine—a means, not an end—an instrument of the same class as a ship or a cart, a means of conveyance. The common cart transfers weights, the money cart transfers ownership. Whoever bought a cart for the purpose of enjoyment in itself? What man not under a delusion ever bought money, coin, except with the object of exchanging it for something which he needed?

Mill is to the same effect. He says:

It must be evident, however, that the mere introduction of a particular mode of exchanging things for one another by first exchanging a thing for money and then exchanging the money for something else makes no difference in the essential character of transactions. It is not with money that things are really purchased. Nobody's income (except that of the gold or silver miner) is derived from the precious metals. The dollars or cents which a person receives weekly or yearly are not what constitutes his income; they are a sort of tickets or orders which he can present for payment at any shop he pleases, and which entitle him to receive a certain value of any commodity that he makes choice of. The farmer pays his laborers and his landlord in these tickets as the most convenient plan for himself and them; but their real income is their share of his corn, cattle, and hay, and it makes no essential difference whether he distributes it to them directly or sells it for them and gives them the price. There can not, in short, be intrinsically a more insignificant thing in the economy of society than money, except in the character of a contrivance for sparing time and labor. It is a machine for doing quickly and commodiously what would be done, though less quickly and commodiously, without it; and, like many other kinds of machinery, it only exerts a distinct and independent influence of its own when it gets out of order.

Now, if credit is substituted for the coined disc, the exchanges, especially those operated through clearing houses, which represent all the exchanges done by associated banks, are simply enormous.

About 2 per cent of these clearings are settled with money in New York. At this ratio twenty-two billions in money in forty years were required to settle eleven hundred billion dollars of transactions in that city.

Mill says that credit exchanges have as much to do with prices as metal money, namely:

In the case, however, of payment by checks, the purchases are, at any rate, made not with the money in the buyers' possession, yet with money to which he has a right. But he may make purchases with money which he only expects to have, or even only pretends to expect. He may obtain goods in return for his acceptances payable at a future time, or on his note of hand, or on a simple book credit, that is, on a mere promise to pay. All these purchases have exactly the same effect on price as though they were made with ready money. The amount of purchasing power which a person can exercise is composed of all the money in his possession or due to him and of all his credit. For exercising the whole of this power he finds a sufficient motive only under peculiar circumstances, but he always possesses it; and the portion of it which he at any time does exercise is the measure of the effect which he produces on price.

If this be so, Mr. President, and there is no gainsaying it, wherefore these tears about driving down prices by demonetizing silver, when bits of paper do immensely more work than either gold or silver?

The favored metal, that for which hideous conspiracies are hatched which ruin kings and money lords as well as everybody else, does not figure in these transactions any more than silver. Gold simply stands behind these credit transactions to redeem ultimately the balances found due.

Interchange of commodities necessarily constitutes mutual debts and credits; these offset one another to 98 per cent in large commercial centers and about 95 per cent as a general average.

These credits depend upon confidence; confidence in personal integrity, and confidence in the final adjustment of balances in the best money. If this confidence is impaired in the currency dependent upon gold the whole fabric is threatened.

This accounts for the disastrous effects of the panic of 1893. Confidence in the ability of the Government to keep up a reserve of one hundred millions, to hold up a volume of subsidiary and paper money of upward of one thousand million dollars, was seriously impaired.

There were abundant crops, and prices, though low, compared favorably with the flourishing decade antedating the war.

It was not an industrial but a financial panic, acute, penetrating, and destructive, though of short duration.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to show that the free coinage of silver, at any ratio, has never kept the metals together, nor has the legal ratio ever corresponded for any length of time with the commercial ratio. I annex tables from Soetbeer and Shaw, the latter showing the legal ratio in Europe for two hundred years and the former the commercial ratio.

These tables show that for two hundred years the legal ratios of Europe were constantly altered, and yet an equivalence between them and the commercial ratios was never attained.

They show that it is beyond the power of man or of government to establish an arbitrary equivalence between commodities. Our own Government ought to afford a convincing example. In 1792 the legal ratio of 15 to 1 corresponded, for a time, to the commercial ratio. After a space silver became overrated by the ratio of 15 to 1; as a consequence, gold fled the country. In 1834 the ratio was changed to 16 to 1. This overrated gold by the ratio, and silver fled. In 1853 the fractional coinage was debased in order to keep it from running away, and a gold standard was deliberately adopted by underrating silver in the coinage, with the avowed purpose of keeping the gold standard. France was practically a silver country until the discovery and development of the California and Australian gold mines, when she became a gold country.

I read in this connection from the speech of Mr. Cyrus L. Dunham in 1853. The bill to regulate fractional coins was up, and he said:

> I repeat, in reply to the gentleman, we propose, so far as these coins are concerned, to make the silver subservient to the gold coin of the country. We intend to do what the best writers on political economy have approved; what experience, where the experiment has been tried, has demonstrated to be best, and what the committee believe to be necessary and proper—to make but one standard of currency, and to make all others subservient to it. We mean to make the gold the standard coin, and to make these new silver coins applicable and convenient not for large but for small transactions. I trust this sufficiently explains the reason of our pursuing this course.

The theory of the bimetallist that a double standard is so arranged that the demand will fall on the dearer metal when the cheaper gets scarce and high and keep the money plane even is wrong in principle and disastrous in practice. It ignores the essential factor of individual estimate and comparison. It flies in the face of every correct theory of political economy and every fact of history. The double standard implies a single standard. The metals will part; the dearer will leave and will not return until the ratio conforms to the commercial value. This involves a constant and never-ending recoinage, which is impracticable and inefficient.

In this condition of affairs, wisdom points to accepting the free and unbiased action of other civilized nations of the world. It appears, further, from the table annexed, that prices now are not greatly different from those prevailing in the decade from 1850 to 1860. True, they have been low, but there is no single article cheapened in price where the decline can be attributed to an appreciation of gold. It is an accepted canon of political economy that nothing but a rise in money will effect a universal and uniform fall in prices. This must be so, because trade, being an interchange of product through the instrumentality of money, one commodity falling another must rise. Where prices fall or rise irregularly other than money causes must be at work. While it is true that general advancement in production necessarily brings about lower prices, it is equally true that a fall must be horizontal in order that it may be attributed to appreciated money. Now, the table of prices from the London Economist, copied from Senate Report 1394, shows a decline, but it shows an irregular decline from the seventies to 1891.

I here insert this table, showing the average price of various articles and of all articles from 1840 to 1891.

a In converting currency prices into gold we have used the value of $100 gold in currency as given for January of each year in the American Almanac for 1878, as follows: 1862, $102.5; 1863, $145.1; 1864, $155.5; 1865, $216.2; 1866, $140.1; 1867, $134.6; 1868, $138.5; 1869, $135.6; 1870, $121.3; 1871, $110.7; 1872, $109.1; 1873, $112.7; 1874, $111.4; 1875, $112.5; 1876, $112.8; 1877, $106.2, and 1878, $101.4.

The table shows a decline, mostly in manufactured articles. For instance, fuel and lighting show a decline from the basic line of 100 in 1860 to 91 in 1891; house-furnishing goods show a decline from the same line to 70.1; the first, 9 per cent; the second, 30 per cent.

Take clothing. The decline is to 81.1 from the basic line of 100 in 1860. Then compare with lumber and building materials, where we find a rise to 122.3, which is an advance of 22 per cent. The fall in clothing is 21 points from 100; the rise in food is 3 per cent. The table shows a decline in manufactured articles where inventive methods have been mostly applied, and an actual rise in some where it is manifest no great inventive skill has been adopted.

The average, 92.3, is only a fall of 7.7 from 1860 to 1891.

There are also some instructive instances of the decline and rise of prices by taking the period from 1840 to 1860. Fuel and lighting, in 1840, stood at 395.8; in 1859, at 98; drugs and chemicals, at 145.8 in 1840; in 1859, at 104.2; house-furnishing goods in 1840, at 116.4; in 1859, at 103. So there were as violent fluctuations, and more so, in the two decades from 1840 to 1860 as in the three decades from 1860 to 1891. The standard, practically, was gold then as now, but no outcry about the crime of demonetization was heard.

Now, though prices have declined irregularly, human labor has advanced about 30 per cent.

As the efficiency of human exertion increases, so the human toiler is paid more and more, but the product is diminished in cost, and the human toiler feeds his fellow-creatures more cheaply, houses and clothes them better at less cost than ever before in the history of the race. Is this not a blessing, Mr. President?

But it appears that at and about the time civilized nations discarded an inferior to adopt a superior tool of exchange, and a more stable standard of value, there was a surprising development of inventive skill and genius in adopting labor-saving machines to secure larger output with less cost.

So says Mr. D. H. Wells in his work entitled Recent Economic Changes.

As victory after victory is won and as production is constantly cheapened, so will the multitudes of the earth rejoice in the joint blessings bestowed by kind Providence and their own skill and industry.

Sir, I was charmed with the showing made by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in his very able speech in the Senate on the 10th instant of the prosperity of the woolen factories in the United States. But I was startled when he diverted my gaze from the roseate picture of prosperity and advancement in the woolen industry to have them turned by the same magic tongue of eloquence to the irrepressible conflict between two metals. He hoped, and the hope implied a fear, that the "conflict" would not be settled by the sword.

Sir, our country is advancing with more rapid strides than any country ever did before under God's kind heaven. Wealth, though abnormally large in some cases, is more evenly distributed, life and liberty are better protected, comfort and happiness are more universal, than in any country or in any clime. And we pause in the midst of our greatness and wealth and comfort and liberty to almost come to arms about whether one bit of metal should circulate as money with another bit of metal at 16 to 1.

You and I, Mr. President, are to have nothing to say about it, the trading world is to have nothing to say about, the parties to an exchange are to have nothing to say about it, but a kind, paternal Government, by statutory law, by force, as it were, of governmental wind, is to say these two bits of metal shall circulate at the talismanic figure of 16 to 1.

Sir, I know it is a pleasing statement to make to the ordinary man: "My friend, you haven't money enough; these money kings are keeping you out of half your money." Says the man, "How am I to get it? Of course I haven't enough." "The easiest thing in the world. Just make your representatives in Congress vote for a law to admit silver to free coinage at 16 to 1 and you will have all you want. All the silver will come in and your corn, oats, wheat, and cotton will run up to double the present price."

This pleasing delusion is seized on with avidity, and the followers of the silver standard are arrayed as a hostile camp against those who have the temerity to think that government can not put more value on a piece of metal than the estimate of mankind puts upon it.

The report of the Director of the Mint for 1895 shows that in five years from and including 1881 to 1885 there were $99,116,000 produced in the world, and in the year 1894 there were $180,626,100 of gold produced, nearly twice as much in one year as there was in the five years mentioned, and the production of gold from 1887 shows a marked increase, and the production of silver shows no marked decline.

This shows that there need be no alarm about a scarcity of gold. It is produced faster than population increases, and meets the quantitive theory with a complete answer. Another delusion is the per capita argument. It is held that because France has some $40 per capita, therefore we ought to have $40 per capita.

I annex tables prepared by the Treasury Department, showing that we have now more per capita circulation than we ever had, than we had in the halcyon days of prosperity between 1850 and 1860.

But, sir, no man can tell what the needs of a particular nation may be as to circulation. It is clear that, when the vast majority of business exchanges are conducted without any money, but a small per capita circulation is wanted. Money will inevitably flow where it is most wanted. It is most wanted in large commercial centers, and there it will always flow. Country people have less need of money, have infinitely fewer exchanges, and the idea that everybody's pocket ought to be filled, for no purpose of exchange, is absurd. Mill, page 327, lays down the proposition that credit is purchasing power and affects prices as much as money; consequently does away with money to the extent it is used.

Says Mill:

3. But a more intricate portion of the theory of credit is its influence on prices, the chief cause of most of the mercantile phenomena which perplex observers. In a state of commerce in which much credit is habitually given, general prices at any moment depend much more upon the state of credit than upon the quantity of money. For credit, though it is not productive power, is purchasing power; and a person who, having credit, avails himself of it in the purchase of goods, creates just as much demand for the goods, and tends quite as much to raise their price, as if he made an equal amount of purchases with ready money.

Credit, in short, has exactly the same purchasing power with money, and as money tells upon prices not simply in proportion to its amount, but to its amount multiplied by the number of times it changes hands, so also does credit; and credit transferable from hand to hand is in that proportion more potent than credit which only performs one purchase.

NOTE 1.—Specie payments were suspended from January 1, 1862, to January 1, 1870. During the greater part of that period gold and silver coins were not in circulation except on the Pacific Coast, where, it is estimated, the specie circulation was generally about $25,000,000. This estimated amount is the only coin included in the above statement from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

NOTE 2.—In 1876 subsidiary silver again came into use, and is included in this statement, beginning with that year.

NOTE 3.—The coinage of standard silver dollars began in 1878 under the act of February 28, 1878.

NOTE 4.—Specie payments were resumed January 1, 1879, and all gold and silver coins, as well as gold and silver bullion in the Treasury, are included in this statement from and after that date.

NOTE 5.—This table represents the circulation of the United States as shown by the revised statements of the Treasury Department for June 30 of each of the years specified.

e Specie in Treasury estimated.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. If the quantity of the metal in circulation does not affect the value of money and of commodities, why is it that the Senator argues that if we coin so much silver and there is more silver to coin the price of it will go down? He argues in one breath, permit me to say, against the quantitative theory of money and then he urges the quantitative theory of money against the coinage of silver. If the quantity of money in circulation does not affect the value of money and the value of commodities, I ask how is it that he argues that the multiplication of silver dollars will depreciate the currency and injure trade?

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Virginia will pardon me. I never said the multiplication of silver dollars will not affect the currency at all. I have conterded and do contend that the coinage of silver at 16 to 1 will contract the currency just precisely by the amount of gold we possess, because I believe the admission of silver to coinage at 16 to 1 will inevitably run out the gold.

Mr. DANIEL. Where will it run the gold to, if the Senator will allow me to ask him?

Mr. CAFFERY. It will run the gold to the four corners of the globe.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. If gold is driven to Europe and other countries by the coinage of silver in this country, will not the gold that goes to those countries swell the volume of currency in gold there; and swelling the volume of currency in gold, will it not increase the prices of cotton, corn, wheat, meat, and other things that we send to the markets in which there is that increase in the volume of money?

Mr. CAFFERY. That is a hypothetical question which hardly admits of an answer yea or nay. A large portion of the gold would be hoarded. A very large portion of the silver used now in silver countries would be displaced by gold. To that extent I believe there would be no increase of the currency of Europe, because the gold would simply supply the place now held by silver. However, I have not held that there is nothing in the quantitative theory. I say there is not everything in the quantitative theory, as applied to metallic money.

I have argued that credit in the shape that credit now purchases in the United States and England has just as much effect upon prices as purchases made in metallic money. That has been my argument. I say the amount of money that is necessary to circulate the products of any particular country is of all matters the most difficult of exact arithmetical computation, for money is valuable as a vehicle of exchange in proportion to the rapidity of its circulation, in proportion to the number of exchanges it effects. One dollar will sometimes do as much with a highly commercial people as a hundred dollars. Therefore, you can not say, in my opinion, that this nation, that nation, or the other nation has to have a circulating medium just exactly proportioned to its population.

The fact is that more silver coin is used now in this country under a gold standard than was ever used under a bimetallic standard. Gold countries use silver as a necessary adjunct; but silver countries do not and can not use gold. It will not circulate where a cheap metal is the standard. But another fact of pregnant importance is that wherever gold has become the standard of value it has never been supplanted by silver in modern times; but silver has been dethroned from supremacy in every advanced nation and can not regain its sway.

The charge that the rulers and bankers of the earth are combined to ruin the masses by maintaining a standard constantly appreciating, and thereby constantly depreciating all commodities, is hardly worth considering. No banker will ruin himself. No ruler will despoil his subjects simply to despoil. The ruler, the banker, the toiler, and the beggar stand on the same plane as to sound money.

Civilization, from diversity of pursuits, from difference in intelligence and of industry, makes wide differences in human beings and in human possessions. It is the penalty for enlightenment and advancement. The savage alone remains in an equality of ignorance and of property. As man advances to a higher plane the difference between human toilers becomes marked. All along the incline that leads to the summit of civilization the busy throngs struggling for the top are separated from each other by various gaps. They pass and repass and constantly change places. It is decreed thus in the economy of God.

And who will chide at the divine arrangement which makes some hewers of wood and some drawers of water, so that in the school of adversity and poverty those powers and qualities are developed that make men rulers of men and princes of the earth; that make the foremost in the column give way to the superior energy and ability of those in the rear; that place a French lieutenant on the imperial throne of France, and a rail splitter in the Presidential chair of the greatest, freest Republic of the world?

I have tried to prove—

First. That value only originates from the estimation that parties to an exchange of commodities place upon the commodities offered in exchange.

Second. That metallic money is a commodity and is subject in every exchange to this estimate.

Third. That the estimate, being subjective and mental, can not be made by governmental statute.

Fourth. That when two metals are attempted to be held by a legal tie, one or the other will become underrated by the commercial ratio, which is the estimate placed upon it by exchangers, and therefore will leave circulation.

Fifth. That consequently bimetallism is really monometallism.

Sixth. That in case the United States adopted 16 to 1, when the commercial ratio is 32 to 1, gold would leave circulation, and we would be on a silver basis.

Seventh. That no man can contemplate this result without a shudder at the fearful loss, ruin, and disorder that would ensue.

Mr. President, I have here a speech delivered in Texas by Judge George N. Aldredge, and I propose, with the consent of the Senate, to insert it in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF JUDGE GEORGE N. ALDREDGE, OF DALLAS, TEX., ON THE FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

The proposition that this Government should coin silver for the world, in unlimited amount, at double its market value, is so repugnant to the common sense of mankind that it ought to be unnecessary to discuss it, and would be but for the fact that a portion of our people have been misled by appeals to their prejudice and by the specious reasoning of sophists. If our Government were asked to declare that 2 quarts equaled a gallon, or to revise the multiplication table and enact that 10 times 10 equaled 200, all men would see the folly; but when asked to believe that $10 worth of silver, by being touched by the Government stamp, instantly becomes worth $20, many people honestly believe this miracle may be accomplished, and many others affect to believe it for practical purposes. In all ages of the world there have been delusions in reference to money, and in spite of uniform disastrous results many are ever ready to listen to the teachings of any charlatan who claims that he has discovered a shorter route to wealth. They refuse to apply to money that hard common sense which they exercise in dealing with the everyday affairs of life. The ignorant have always had superstitions about silver. Among the negroes of the South nothing would kill a witch but a silver bullet.

That our ancestors a hundred years ago fixed a unit of value in gold or silver and fixed a ratio between them is immaterial to us. Their example in so doing is not more binding on us than their methods of business, their means of transportation, or the implements with which they sowed and reaped. It would be a sad commentary upon our intelligence if we had learned nothing in a hundred years. We do know that in fixing a ratio they attributed no magic to the Government stamp, but sought diligently to ascertain the market value of the two metals in the leading nations of the world, and conformed, as they thought, strictly to this market ratio. By pursuing the method adopted by them we would now fix the ratio at about 32 to 1.

The consistent man is not the one who stands in one place always, regardless of the changing conditions around him, but it is he who, with intelligence and circumspection, adapts himself to the changed condition of affairs. For nearly twenty years every enlightened nation in the world has been on a gold-standard basis. They are all representative governments and their laws are made by their people and for their people. The government which first established the gold standard is more obedient to the will of its people than ours is. When an important administration measure is defeated by the representatives of the English people, the government is immediately placed in the hands of the opposition. The gold standard nations are those that have reclaimed the world from barbarism, and have given it all its learning and invention; where schools and churches abound; where the dignity of man is maintained and labor properly rewarded; and they control the commerce of the world.

These nations, after testing gold and silver for hundreds of years, voluntarily adopted the gold standard. No nation to-day has the silver standard from choice. It is only because they are weak and helpless to remedy the evil that any of them remain on a silver basis. But to-day the United States, the foremost nation in all the earth in solvency and resources, in intelligence and energy, is seriously invited to abandon the standard of civilization and commerce and to consort with half-civilized, half-clad people, who are weak and ignorant; who have little or no commerce; where bull fights abound and schools do not; where human labor is in sharp competition with the meek and lowly jackass; where a breech-clout is preferred to a full suit, and where the bulk of the people know no more about a standard of value than a mule does about the nebular hypothesis. Surely we would do well to take a look at the company before we sit down to the feast.

The invitation is that this country, after having adjusted its enormous business for twenty years to a gold standard, shall suddenly readjust all business and all values to what is termed a double standard of gold and silver. The arguments advanced in behalf of such a change are:

First. A double standard resting upon gold and silver would give a more correct measure of value and one less liable to fluctuation than a single gold standard.

Second. Gold has appreciated in value and all property measured by it has declined in value.

Third. The supply of gold is inadequate to make it a safe standard and the scarcity of it will tend to the depression of prices.

Fourth. The free, unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will create unlimited demand for silver and restore it to par.

Fifth. Free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 will increase the prices of property.

With reference to the first proposition: A standard of value is some exact measure which enters into and becomes a part of every contract and to which all obligations are referable. If our Government could, by legal enactment, fix the value of gold and silver in the markets of the world and could keep them adjusted to a fixed ratio, a double standard would be practicable. But it can not fix or maintain value; the buyers of the world—the merchants—do that. When Abraham purchased his lot in Ephron's cemetery he weighed out to Ephron silver "current money with the merchant." And the merchants of the world have been saying what shall be "current money" from that day to this.

Governments are as powerless to suspend the law of value as they are to suspend the law of gravitation. Such being the case, I can conceive of two standards, one of gold and the other of silver, and contracts might be made referable to either standard; but the indeterminate double standard, resting on two metals, not linked together by any binding obligation, but both acting under go-as-you-please rules, is to me absolutely incomprehensible. We can not bind them together as we do two metals in the pendulum of a clock, or in the mainspring of a watch.

No people ever did business under the imaginary double standard, and every attempt to enforce it has resulted in alternating from one standard to the other. England tried it for four hundred and seventy years and it was an utter failure. France changed her ratio 118 times in twelve years trying to walk the double-standard tight rope. We tried it, and went first to a silver basis, then to a gold basis, then to a paper basis, and then back to a gold basis. The phrase, "double standard," is a contradiction of terms. Standard means correct measure, and there can not be two different correct measures of value, any more than there can be two different correct weights to sell by, two different correct compasses to sail by, or two different correct thermometers to measure temperature by. If one measure is correct, the other can not differ from it and be correct. It is an inexorable law of money that when two metals are coined at a fixed ratio and both made legal tender, if either is undervalued in the coinage law the undervalued metal goes out of circulation.

About the middle of the fourteenth century Nicholas Oresme, the father of finance in France, announced his great law to Charles V; one hundred and thirty years later Copernicus, the founder of modern astronomy, announced it to the Prussians, and thirty-two years still later Gresham announced it to Queen Elizabeth. Macaulay, in his History of England, shows how perfectly this law worked in England, and eloquently describes the direful consequences. He was describing coins debased by clipping, but still legal tender. A coin is just as bad when debased by overvaluation in coinage as when clipped or counterfeited. In the one case the creditor is deceived and in the other he is forced. It is simply the difference between theft and robbery. The law of money has never failed. We know what will be its operation just as we know that the deadliest poison will kill because it always has killed.

The gold-standard advocates believe in gold as a standard with the largest possible safe use of silver among the people. The 16 to 1 dreamers believe in the so-called double standard and we are driven by this law to the use of silver alone. All gold-standard countries use large amounts of silver and no silver-standard country uses any gold whatever. As the practical question is the use of the metals, it follows that we are the bimetallists and the 16 to 1 people are the monometallists. Hence, the battle that is to be fought to a finish next year is whether we will remain under a gold standard with actual bimetallism in use among the people—gold and silver circulating freely without discrimination against either; or shall we have a so-called double standard at the mints and nowhere else, with silver monometallism in actual use? The battle is between substance and shadow, between those who want bimetallism in fact and those who want it in name only.

We are the friends of silver money, who would bring to its aid the power of the Government to keep it good, and they are its enemies, who, by unlimited coinage, would take from it the guaranty of parity by the Government, and thereby degrade it to its market value. Our Government has been and is now coining silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. It is enabled to do this because under the law it can restrict the amount coined, and being vested with this control it undertakes to make every dollar good money. The moment the Government loses control of the coinage, confidence in its ability to protect the money issued is gone, and a silver dollar then rests on its merits and is worth 50 cents. To illustrate: A merchant could very well guarantee the expenses of his clerk if he were allowed to control the expenses, but if the clerk demanded free and unlimited expenses, then the merchant would have to "stand from under" and let the expenses take care of themselves.

We hear a great deal of indignant declamation because the Government does not pay its "coin" obligations in silver. To maintain the parity between gold and silver it is essential that the Government in receiving its dues and paying its debts must ignore the inferiority of silver, just as a mother pretends not to see the limp of her lame child. This gives the option of metals to the person dealing with the Government, whether as debtor or creditor. If the Government should discriminate against silver by refusing to receive it for dues or by insisting on paying it instead of gold, that moment the parity would be gone and the silver in every man's pocket would be at a discount. Its coinage being under the control of the Government, the Government makes it good at its counter, and this makes it good at every counter in the world.

If there is anything in the double-standard-stability idea we ought to work for it for all it is worth. If two metals will fix value better than one, then three metals will beat two, and four beat three, and by having eight or ten metals in the standard we can anchor it so that it will not crawl an inch in a thousand years.

The second proposition is that gold has appreciated, and thereby depressed prices. The same cause operating upon a number of articles will produce the same effect in all those not affected by a contravening cause. When we contemplate prices we find that since the gold standard was adopted, February 12, 1873, some articles have declined in value, some have remained stationary, while some have risen in value; and no contravening causes will account for the failure of gold to depress all alike. We find that no two articles have declined at the same time or in the same degree, nor has any one article remained uniformly depressed. This demonstrates that, as to those articles that have declined, no one controlling cause can be assigned as having produced these results.

The stock argument of the 16-to-1 people is that wheat and cotton have declined, and they seem to gloat over the fact. I knew an old negro who, when asked how he was getting along, always replied, "Poorly, thank God," and they are thankful when the country is poorly on wheat and cotton. Since 1873 the vast fertile prairies of the Northwest have been turned into wheat fields, so that the production of wheat in the United States has been doubled since then. The same thing has been going on in Russia and South America. The wonderful improvements in machinery for harvesting wheat and the extension of railroads for transporting it to market gave an immense impetus to the production of it. A farmer can make more money raising it at 50 cents per bushel to-day than he could at $1 per bushel twenty years ago.

The result has been that the overproduction of wheat has reduced its price, and the gold standard had nothing to do with the reduction. Its price is regulated by supply and demand. Last May a little bug settled down on the wheat fields of the Northwest and in one or two weeks ate up one-half of the 16 to 1 argument on prices and sent the prices back into the neighborhood of those of 1873. The old hayseeds, who knew the habits of the chinch bug and the kind of a multiplication table he used in regulating the increase in his family, took the trains for Chicago, commenced buying wheat and broke all the smartaleks in the city. They may have talked gold-standard depression at home, but they put their money on the chinch bug in the city, and won.

The caterpiller and bollworm can do the same thing for cotton. I only know the chinch bug by reputation, but I am personally acquainted with these worms. They are composed of appetite and skin. They do not care a tinker's blessing for anybody's standard, and when they invade the cotton fields of the South they send the price of cotton up in every mart of the world, gold standard or no gold standard. They have been doing business with us this summer and have moved the price of cotton up 60 per cent. This bug and these worms have not many friends, but as sluggers in an argument with a 16 to 1 crank they are entitled to the belt.

Cotton brought $1 a pound in New York during the war, and 30 or 40 cents a pound the first year after the war, on account of the four years' cotton famine from 1861 to 1865, and it was several years getting down to its normal price. The price declined when we made too much of it. The largest cotton crop made with slave labor was 4,669,770 bales, and I remember it was confidently predicted that no such crop would ever be made with free labor. The crop of 1872 was less than 3,000,000 bales, and we gradually increased it to a little less than 10,000,000 bales in 1894. India, Egypt, and Brazil are also raising larger crops of cotton. The immense crop of 1894 was thrown upon a market illy prepared to receive it. For three years there had been less cotton goods consumed than usual, owing to the world-wide panic and depression of business following the Baring failure, and these two conditions meeting, overproduction and underconsumption, brought cotton down to a very low price.

Some of the Populists tell us there can not be overproduction until every man, woman, and child in the world has a rotund stomach and a full suit of clothes. This is based upon the communistic idea that it is the duty of the Government to take care of every loafer who is too lazy to work for a living, and is too contemptible to waste an answer on. If the gold standard depressed wheat and cotton, it was surely loaded at both ends, for it has shot some things up in price. The corn crop of the United States is more valuable than both the wheat and cotton crops combined.

The crop of corn made just preceding the gold standard, in 1872, sold for 34 cents at gold figures, and the crop of 1894 was worth 45 cents in gold, and it has generally been above the 1872 price. The oat crop is about equal to the wheat crop; oats were worth 29 cents in 1872 and 32 cents in 1894. Fat beef steers were worth $40 in gold in 1872 and $60 in gold in 1895. Hogs are worth more now than they were in 1872 and have generally been higher than they were then. The farmers' wives get as much in gold now for butter, chickens, and eggs as they did in greenbacks in 1872, and this crop is more valuable than the wheat and cotton crops combined.

Tobacco, potatoes, bacon, hay, coffee, leather, whisky, and a hundred other things have not declined in price. The labor crop is equal in value to all other crops combined, and it has steadily advanced in price. Land is much more valuable in gold now than in 1872, notwithstanding it was depressed by the panic of 1892 and 1893. The price of wool has declined, but the world's production of it since 1872 has doubled and the use of it has been partly supplanted by the use of cotton goods. Horses have declined, but the railroads, electric cars, and bicycles are doing the work they did.

The cost of the production of an article fixes its value. This is necessarily so, because if the profit is large, others will be attracted to the business until the price is brought to its proper level. All articles manufactured by machinery have declined in price, for the reason that with each invention the cost of producing the article is lessened. Human genius has produced more results for cheapening production in the last fifty years than in all the ages of the world before that time. These grand triumphs of man over matter, instead of showing depression from a standard of value, show forth the glory and dignity of the human intellect, and are an unmixed blessing to the whole human family. Could anyone outside of a lunatic asylum attribute all these diverse and inconsistent movements of prices to one cause, and that cause acting evenly and uniformly upon all things alike?

Interest has declined since 1872 in my part of the country from 3 per cent per month to 6 and 8 per cent per annum. There is no denying the fact that the gold bugs did that. The South and West have saved more on the decline of interest than they have lost in the decline in wheat and cotton. Interest is always low under an honest standard, among an honest people, where money is plentiful. It is lower in London than in any other spot on the globe, because her standard is stable and her commercial integrity has been the care of her statesmen and her people for ages past. England's punctuality in meeting her obligations has made London the clearing house of the world.

Tyre was the London of ancient times. Seated on the eastern end of the Mediterranean, she reigned queen of commerce for centuries. The scepter of commercial greatness passed from her when her own children reared Carthage at the other end of that sea. Some three hundred years ago England planted colonies in America, and to-day the United States is England's only formidable rival for the commerce of the world. The object lesson of ancient history is being repeated. If the insatiable mine owners, by use of their millions, and the place-hunting demagogues, by unctuous appeals to prejudice, succeed in driving this country from the standard of civilization and commerce, the standard that announces integrity at home and inspires confidence abroad, to a flat standard and silver basis, then England will have no rival to grapple with her in the marts of the world.

The third proposition is that the supply of gold is insufficient to make it a correct standard, and its scarcity will tend to depress prices. The average annual output of gold of the world for the first half of this century, in round numbers, was $15,000,000. From 1851 to 1865, covering the gold boom in California and Australia, the yearly average was $130,000,000. The output for 1893 was $155,000,000, and for 1894 $181,000,000. The birth rate among gold-using countries is not increasing, while the production of gold is on the increase, as just stated. This answer ought to satisfy even the extreme 16 to 1 people—the "per capita" Populist—especially in view of the fact that improvements in power and machinery are being applied to the production of gold, while the genius of invention finds no inducement offered nor field for operation in the population business.

My next answer is that the more highly enlightened the world becomes, and the greater the improvements in business methods, the less necessity there is for the use of actual money of any kind. Steam and electricity have so knitted civilized people together that they are practically one community. Business men speak to each other around the world as if they were assembled in the same building. Their business is done on a system of credits, without the use of money, except for ultimate settlement, Nor is this method confined to business men. It is broadening with the evolution of man from a lower to a higher plane of intelligence.

A farmer may now live for a whole year on the fat of the land and never handle a dollar in money during that time. He may receive checks for his crop, deposit them to his credit with a bank, and draw on the bank for what he owes and spends. Neither he nor the men who bought his crop had a dollar in the bank. They only had credit there. The bank owns the money in its vault, and its customers simply have the bank's obligation. Bank credits perform precisely the same work that gold and silver do, and they perform it much quicker and more conveniently. The Scots are the most conservative people in the world, and they have had the best banking system of any people for two hundred years. On a gold reserve of $23,652,000 they support bank credits to the amount of $448,288,000. The best authorities estimate that only one bill of exchange in five hundred thousand is ever paid in money in England. Gold, silver, and other money perform 1 per cent of the exchanges in this country, and credits, in the shape of bills, notes, checks, etc., do the other 99 per cent. The business of the world could no more be done to-day with gold and silver than its inland transportation could be done with ox wagons.

The 16 to 1 orators, in denouncing the act of 1873, assert that half the money of the country was destroyed, and hold out the idea that our money has been contracted to that extent. In 1872 our population was 40,596,000, and our per capita of money was $18.79. In 1894, after the country had been suffering with gold standard for twenty-one years, our population is 68,275,000 and our per capita of money is $35.44, and we have much better money now than we had then. The adoption of the gold standard as a measure of value did not increase the demand for gold for use to any great extent. Alcohol is the standard for measuring the strength of all spirituous liquors, yet that fact has never been found to be very straining on alcohol.

Fourth proposition, that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 would create unlimited demand for silver and restore it to a par. How the mere coinage of silver can in any way increase its use among the people I am unable to understand. If there was not enough of it for use as money and the Government was limiting the coinage of it, and thereby denying the people the use of it as money, then there would be force in the proposition to increase the coinage of silver. But our condition is exactly the reverse of that. The amount of coined and uncoined silver in the Treasury is $512,000,000, while the amount in circulation is about $107,000,000.

To encourage the use of silver by the people the Government exchanges coined silver at its mints for gold or legal-tender currency, and pays the express charges on the silver to any part of the country. This coined silver is all good money. The dollars are legal tender for all debts in any amount, and the halves, quarters, and dimes are exchangeable, in sums of $20, for gold or other legal tenders. Notwithstanding the inducement offered by the Government to promote the use of silver, it has hitherto been unable to force into circulation more than about one-fifth of its stock on hand. Then why all this clamor for more coinage? If a man had five times as much blood in his body as his arteries and veins would circulate and four-fifths of it was lying idle around his heart, would anyone say that such a man needed a free and unlimited infusion of blood?

A government can no more induce people to use money they do not want than it can induce them to eat what they do not like. The true place of silver is as a change money. It is indispensible for that purpose and unsuited to any other, and all the silver-tongued orators in the land can not change this fact. The $1, $2.50, and $3 gold pieces were too small and were unpopular as change money, and the Government stopped the coinage of them. On the other hand, silver is not a debt-paying money in any considerable amount, nor the money of commerce, for the reason that it is too bulky and too heavy. When a man gets over $5 or $10 of it, he unloads on the first bank he comes to, and the bank unloads on the Treasury. Thus the circulation of it is limited to just what the people will use. When the people get enough of a thing they know it, and you can not argue with them about it. They are gullible on theories, but intensely practical in business.

We have heard a great deal about demonetization of silver. Let us see the extent of "the great crime of 1873." In 1853, in order to prevent the subsidiary coin from going abroad, the silver half dollar was reduced in weight from 206¼ to 192 grains, and the quarters, dimes, and 5-cent pieces were reduced in the same proportion. These coins were then made a legal tender for only $5 in amount, and the coinage of them for private account was stopped; but the Government purchased the silver bullion and coined them as they were needed. So, no crime was committed in 1873 against the halves, quarters, dimes, and half dimes. That crime was committed under Millard Fillmore.

In 1879 these coins were made legal tender for sums not exceeding $10. In 1873 the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains was left out of the coinage act and the trade dollar of 420 grains was substituted for it. This was done at the request of the Pacific Slope, to enable our dollar to compete with the Mexican dollar of about that weight in China and Japan. The standard dollar was not a legal tender from February 12, 1873, to February 28, 1878, at which time its recoinage was provided for and it was reinstated as a legal tender for all debts, in whatever amount. But $8,000,000 of this "daddy dollar" was coined prior to 1873, out of a total coinage of $1,000,000,000. Jefferson stopped the coinage of it in 1805, and for thirty years not one of them was coined, and the daddies never complained.

They did not have sense enough to see that Jefferson had sold out to Lombard street! These dollars were not in fact legal tenders prior to 1873, because the people did not tender them in payment of debts nor in purchase of goods. They had not been in circulation since Andrew Jackson was President, and hardly any middle-aged man had ever seen one of them. The people had demonetized them by melting them down, or by sending them abroad for that purpose, and to this good day they have never been demonetized in any other way. The act of 1873 simply recognized what the people had done, and for five years continued the policy that the people had been pursuing for nearly half a century. The legal-tender faculty of this dollar was restored to it seventeen years ago.

The Government has $350,000,000 of it on hand now, and has stood ready at all times to furnish it to anybody who wanted it. This is the biography of the demonetization mouse that has been evolved from a mountain of denunciation. The poor little thing never lived but five brief years, and has been as dead as a doornail for seventeen years. While it lived it was so harmless the people paid no attention to it. Shakspeare says, "The evil that men do lives after them." But it is even worse in the case of this mouse. The evil that it did not do lives after it in the shape of grasping mine owners, two-ply editors, and unscrupulous politicians.

We are told that the standard dollar is not primary money. It is not a promise to pay; it is a legal tender for all debts, and it does not have to be redeemed in anything on the face of the earth. If any man can give a better definition of primary money than this I would like to see it.

This Government is the fast friend of silver money and of the people who use it rather than of the American and English corporations who mine silver and would coin it at a fictitious valuation. Prior to 1873 this Government coined $144,000,000 of silver; since then, $537,000,000. In twenty-one years, under a gold standard, nearly four times as much silver was coined as in eighty-one years under the so-called double standard. A certain kind lady always chloroformed her child when she whipped it. Miss Silver was assassinated in 1873, at a time when there was almost none of her in circulation, and since that fatal day she has thrived on assassination and has grown from a living skeleton to be the fat woman in the circus. In contemplating her brilliant post-mortem career I am constrained, with the apostle, to exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

After 1873 this country prospered as no other ever did for nineteen years, and we are asked to believe that it took this wide-awake nation nineteen years to find out that it was ruined by the legislation of 1873. The negroes in some sections believe in a hoodoo charm which is harmless for a year, and then suddenly develops insanity, fits, etc. The crime of 1873 seems to have worked in a hoodoo way.

The 16 to 1 people tell us that the coinage of silver will create unlimited demand for it. They decline to give us the howness or the whereforeness of this newborn demand, but with childlike faith they expect it to rise in all its beauty, as the fabled Venus rose from the froth of the sea. They say the demand will come; so the Seventh Day Adventists tell us the end will come, and if their picnic comes off first, they will not need silver; the demand will be for free and unlimited water. They contend, if this Government takes all the silver that comes at 16 to 1 silver will be worth par all over the world, and they use an egg argument to prove it.

They say if a merchant advertises that he will pay 25 cents per dozen for eggs, so long as he has the ability to take all that comes eggs will be worth 25 cents in all that country. But suppose the merchant did not take them? Suppose when a farmer drove up to his store the merchant said unto him, "My friend, you have misunderstood me. I am not buying eggs, I am simply counting them; certifying that they are good, and handing them back to you." What would eggs then be worth? The same old 10 or 15 cents per dozen. Under unlimited coinage the Government would not buy silver nor guarantee the value of the coins. It would stamp it "without recourse." Silver would come from every country in the world, and the Government would be a fool to undertake to guarantee the value of the coins by trying to preserve the parity between the metals. If a herder drove a lot of cow ponies through the mint, and they were branded "$100 horse" and delivered to the owner at the other end of the building, it would not improve the breed of the ponies nor create a wild demand for them at the brand price.

Our Government has lost $200,000,000 trying to create demand for silver, for the sole and separate use, behoof, and benefit of the silver mine owner, by buying it when it did not want it and had no need of it; and the silver-mining "villain still pursues" it! Uncle Sam has this silver on hand now. It would load a two-horse wagon train 173 miles long, putting 1,000 pounds on each wagon, and letting them occupy 30 feet each in line; and I am mean enough to want to see him get even with the game before we start a new deal for anybody's benefit.

If the unlimited coinage of silver by our Government could bring it to par, the immediate effect would be to start every mine and mill in the world running at its utmost capacity, a large portion of the unemployed capital of the world would seek this field, and the bowels of the mountains of the earth would be torn asunder to get the benefit of the double price. In 1894 $214,000,000 of silver was mined and sold at about 63 cents per ounce. If the price was raised to 129 cents per ounce, the 16-to-1 price, what would the harvest be? The old rule of three will solve the problem. If a railway engine will run 90 miles an hour on 63 pounds of steam pressure, how fast would it run on 129 pounds of pressure? The blasted thing would have to stop once in a while and wait for its shadow to catch up.

Senator STEWART and his crowd tell us there can be no flood of silver. In Noah's time there was a man of sanguine temperament like that. He was standing on the tip end of a high mountain and the waters were licking his toes. He hailed Noah and begged to be taken in the ark, but Noah had sailing orders from above, and refused to take him aboard. As Noah sailed away he shook his fist at the old man and exclaimed, "Go to the devil with your old dugout, it isn't going to be much of a shower anyway."

The fifth proposition is that 16 to 1 coinage will increase the prices of property. If this Government should open its mints to coinage of the world's silver at 16 to 1, we would go at once to silver monometallism. This is the voice of all history emphasized by the present status of every free-coinage country on the earth. We can no more have bimetallism in actual use and unlimited silver coinage than we can have a square, round object, or dry, wet weather. Wherein would the people be benefited if they get double prices in half-value money? If farmers' products brought double-prices so would the manufacturers.' The benefits and advantages would be equal, except that buyers would always deduct enough to safely cover the fluctuations of silver, and this amount would be a dead loss to producers and a premium to speculators. I knew a boy who sold a cur dog for $100; but he took pay in pups at $20 apiece, so he was not materially benefited by the inflated prices.

The inflationists admit that their scheme is against the interest of all those who live upon fixed salaries. This includes everyone whose services are paid for by the year, month, week or day, from president of a railway system to hod carrier and those who draw pensions from the Government. History teaches that wages have never participated in boom prices created by debauching the money of a country. They have remained about the same whether paid in good or bad money. The wage earner is a traitor to himself and his family when he lets his prejudice lead him to the inflation camp, and agrees to take his fixed pay in a depreciated money. If this 16 to 1 movement should succeed he would find that he had lost all the vantage ground for which he and his brethern had struck and struggled for a hundred years.

The modicum of prosperity in manufacturing interests in Mexico is based on the degradation of their labor. We do not want prosperity at such a price, and we are getting it rapidly without swindling our labor. When the laborer prospers he becomes a consumer and his prosperity reacts upon and benefits all other interests. In Mexico they have many refined and wealthy people, but their laborer is a peon. He gets from 10 to 30 cents per day in money worth half its face value. He lives in a miserable mud hut, eats the poorest food that will keep his body alive, wears the meanest cloth that will hide it, and is even denied the privilege of a gentlemanly jag and has to get drunk on cactus juice. In every silver or double-standard country in the world the same degradation of labor is apparent.

We are told that silver is the poor man's money. This appeals to his prejudice, and is wholly untrue. Wages are not paid in silver at the end of each day, but they are paid by the year, month, or week in currency or gold, with just enough silver to make the correct change. The kind of money in transit is immaterial so it goes, but when it is hoarded, laid by for a rainy day, then its staying quality becomes interesting. The rich man hoards by investing in property or by depositing in a bank, and the bank has the option of paying him in silver, while a large per cent of the poor men patronize the sockleg and the bosom of the earth, and they always hide gold for two reasons, they have more confidence in its stability, and being less bulky it is easier to hide. So these poor men are on a gold basis and the rich men are on a silver basis, if the banks elect to put them there.

Prejudice is the curse of this country. It is the only reef in the path of our ship of state, the only menace to our experiment of self-government. The prejudice of the uninformed makes them the prey of professional agitators, calamity howlers, and politicians who are an hungered for office.

The argument is made that we owe so much foreign debt that the interest is confiscating us. The ablest financiers on this continent, who have made the subject a study, place our foreign debt at $2,000,000,000, which, as they estimate at a 4½ rate of interest, amounts to an annual interest account of $90,000,000.

Our globe-trotters are spending annually $47,000,000 abroad. Most of them are ignorant of the beauty and grandeur of their own country, which far surpasses anything they see abroad. They ought to give up this foolish fad and spend their millions getting acquainted with this country for a few years. If we are actually insolvent and can not pay we ought to make a general assignment for the benefit of all our creditors. That is the way an honest man does when he fails in business. He does not hide out his property and offer 50 cents on the dollar. Instead of being insolvent we are better able to pay than any people on the face of the earth. Our national debt is in round numbers $915,962,000. It has been reduced to one-third its former amount. In 1865 it was $2,845,907,000.

The debt of Great Britain and Ireland (the creditor nation) is $3,350,719,000; the debt of France is $4,446,000,000; Russia, $3,491,000,000; Austria-Hungary, $2,866,000,000; Italy, $2,324,000,000; Germany, $1,656,000,000; Spain (with one-fourth of our population), $1,251,000,000. The per capita debt of France is $116; of Great Britain and Ireland, $87; Italy, $76; Spain, $73; Russia, $30, while our per capita debt is $14. Uncle Sam, bless his old soul, is the only good housekeeper in the whole lot! Our bank deposits amount to $4,000,000,000, while those of all Europe only amount to $6,500,000,000. By our last census our per capita of wealth, as shown by the assessment rolls, was $341, and the people have never been bad about assessing their property too high.

The war veterans can not be for repudiation on account of our alleged inability to pay. It is a fundamental principle of law and morals that a man must be just before he is generous, and that gifts made by an insolvent are void as to creditors. Our Government is giving them about $140,000,000 annually. If we can afford to be liberal we ought to strain a point and be honest, too. If our Government can give it like a prince, it ought to pay like a gentleman.

A large part of the debts figured against us are in fact not interest-bearing debts. They consist of railroad, real-estate, and other corporation debts where defaults were made, and mortgages on the property have been foreclosed, the property sold, and the debts practically extinguished.

The only debts that the people at large are interested in are the national debt and the State debts. The State debts, by the last census, amounted to $228,997,387. The county debts amounted to $145,048,045; school-district debts, $36,701,948, while the debts of cities and towns amounted to $724,463,060, making a total of $1,135,210,442. You will observe that about three-fourths of this total debt is owed by cities and towns. With this borrowed money they have built gas, electric-light, and waterworks plants, paved their streets, etc.

Now the 16 to 1 city man asks his country brother, who uses coal oil in his house and darkness outside, who draws his water from a well and bathes in the creek, who splits the mud in wet weather and kicks up the dust in dry, to help him repudiate the debt incurred by him in getting ahead of the countryman as to these comforts and conveniences of life. As to all our private domestic debts, it is immaterial to the Government whether the redheaded men owe the blackheaded ones or the blackheaded ones owe the redheaded ones. One holds the debt and the other holds the property it purchased, and they cancel each other.

The suggestion is sometimes made that by the enhancement of gold debts have been increased when measured in property, and therefore they ought to be scaled. I have discussed the gold enhancement theory, but desire to add that practically all our debts were contracted since the gold standard was adopted, and that standard entered into and became a part of every contract, and if gold has advanced it would be just as dishonest to pay by any other standard as it would be if it had not advanced. If a man contract for a thousand bushels of corn it is no answer to his contract to say that corn has risen since the contract was made. Besides, all our obligations have passed from hand to hand, most of them many times, and the present holders had no more to do with the rise or fall of gold than they did with the rise or fall of the tides.

The underlying fructifying element of this 16 to 1 movement is socialism. It is the same old effort to get something for nothing. The Coxeyites wanted grub for nothing. The single-tax cranks want land for nothing. The Populists want Government monopoly of transportation and private monopoly of the wailing business for nothing. The 16 to 1 people want 50 per cent of debts for nothing. The Bellamyites want everything for nothing. And I might suggest that the new woman wants our bifurcated garments for nothing; but that is not pertinent to the subject under discussion, and I will not do so.

The movement means repudiation. All else is theory, pretense, and dreams. It is an effort to pass a left-handed bankrupt bill, not for the benefit of the unfortunate debtor who can not pay, but for the rich as well, who can pay but want to beat their creditors. The poor man is not in debt; he never had a chance to get in debt. The corporations, speculators, and plungers generally constitute the debtor class. Every wage earner belongs to the creditor class. No one would be benefited by 16 to 1 coinage except the debtor class. Even the mine owner would not, for the temporary stimulus given to silver would increase its production until the price would fall below what it is now. On the other hand, all would suffer.

If a bill for free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 were to pass either House of Congress, and it was ascertained that it would pass the other House, and that the President would sign it, the panic that would ensue would be to that of 1893 what a tornado is to a zephyr. Creditors, to avoid being paid in debased money, would crowd and crush for payment as the people do for exit in a theater on an alarm of fire. Credit and confidence, the twin divinities of prosperity, would depart from us. All business would be paralyzed, labor unemployed, and despair would hang her black pall in millions of homes, only to be lifted when reason resumed her sway. It took France fifty years to entirely recover from the John Law fiasco.

The demagogues, in order to undermine the moral sense of the people and make repudiation palatable, rail about England's wealth, and falsely assert that she is trying to dictate our monetary system and to crush us. England is rich, but if she is trying to ruin us she has a peculiar way of manifesting her hostility. For the year ended June 30, 1894, she took $423,000,000 of our exports, about seven times as much as all the free-silver countries in the world. We took $107,000,000 of her exports, and she paid us the difference in gold or its equivalent.

Did you ever hear a butcher or a baker or a man with cotton to sell complaining that his customers had too much money to spend? Instead of trying to drive us to a gold standard it would be immensely to her interest to have her commercial rival abandon the standard of commerce and take a back seat with the half-civilized, noncommercial nations. The ridiculous story of Ernest Seyd was exploded years ago, and though the vase was shattered, the scent of that lie hangs 'round the country still. The silver-tongued orators still tell the people there was a conspiracy to demonetize silver, although no man has ever been able to call the name of a single conspirator.

In 1873 the motive for demonetizing silver was on the wrong side. The silver dollar was then worth nearly 3 cents more than a gold dollar. Who at that time could foresee the fall of silver? Our statesmen and financiers are as shrewd as any on earth, and they got no glimpse of the coming event. Only to these unnamable conspirators was the revelation vouchsafed. It seems they had a little Patmos Isle all to themselves, and worked the world on the heavenly tip!

Several Congressmen, in the presence of an irate constituency, have stated they did not know the standard dollar was being demonetized when they voted for the act of 1873. It was read several times in their presence. There is no way to make people understand things. They might have been deaf. One all-sufficient reason why they did not so understand is that it was not being done. This dollar was not demonetized, but, on the contrary, has been money and good money every day since 1792.

England has loaned us money at a lower rate of interest than anybody else would. This is the very head and front of all her offending, and the violent 16 to 1 people want to punch her head for doing this. There is an old adage which runs this way: "If you want to lose a friend, lend him money."

To prove that it is repudiation of debt and not coinage the 16 to 1 man is after, propose to him free and unlimited coinage without the legal-tender attachment. If there is nothing the matter with silver except the fact that it is debarred from the mints, then free and unlimited coinage, without the leagl-tender provision, would set it all right and bring it to par. Gold would not suffer by such a test. Your proposition would nauseate him. Why? Because it is not coinage he is after, but repudiation, by means of legal-tender law.

They propose two plans for forcing a debased silver standard on the country; first, not allow contracts for payment in gold; second, if this does not work, then reduce the gold in a gold dollar. With reference to the first plan, maintaining the value of money by legal enactment and penalties has been tried in most countries and has proven an ignominious failure in every instance.

England tried it off and on for nearly five hundred years. France tried it for centuries. The North tried it with greenbacks and the South tried it with Confederate money. While it was a death penalty in France to refuse the assignats, they fell in value until it took $36,000 of them to buy one dollar in specie. Eggs must have been worth $500 apiece in assignats. What a pity our inflation friends could not have lived there and then. A government can rob one part of its people for the benefit of the other part as to existing debts, but there its power ends. It can not make its people trade with each other except upon terms satisfactory to both parties to the contract.

If the money offered to the seller does not suit him he does not sell. If offered to a laborer he would need rest. If offered to a farmer for his produce he would only have enough for home consumption, until he found a man with better money, and so it would be all along the line. The proposal to take away the right of contract shows that desperation has usurped the seat of reason. We hold all that we do hold by virtue of contract right. It is the bulwark of our liberty. It was for this, above all things, that Magna Charta was written. When we surrender this supreme right we go back to barbarism and become miserable puppets to every mob that may seize the helm of state.

The other method suggested to bring about parity of the metals is to reduce the gold in a gold dollar. Our Government has hitherto manifested blind, unreasoning prejudice against that kind of statesmanship. Indeed, it has had its deputy marshals busy for a hundred years hunting misguided patriots who were trying to take this near cut to wealth. If this sort of bill ever passes Congress, I suggest as a rider to the bill that all convicted counterfeiters be liberated and given right of action against the Government for false imprisonment. All Governments have honored their pioneers, and these men were but the forerunners—the John the Baptists of this new religion of debauchment of our money.

A republic rests entirely upon the morals of its people. The story of Washington and his hatchet, told by loving lips to innocent childhood, has made millions of truthful men and women. What would be the effect in this country upon unborn generations of a story like this: At the close of the nineteenth century the people of the United States became so corrupt they repudiated one-half of their debts by paying them in money worth only half of its face value?

An American in a foreign land looks with a swelling heart upon "Old Glory" as it proudly flaunts the breeze, the symbol of liberty and honor. Pass this act of repudiation and he would look upon it with shame. For enthusing purposes we might as well pull it down and run up a dish rag.

But, Mr. President and gentlemen, allow me in conclusion to say that our country is in no danger of repudiation. This 16 to 1 coinage clamor is but one of the manifestations of hard times, brought on by the late panic. On lowlands, in the nighttime, a deadly miasma accumulates, but when the bright sun climbs over the hilltops and shoots his purifying rays into the bottom, the miasma is dispelled, the atmosphere is sweetened and made wholesome, and men go forth to their daily avocations with assurance of health.

In spite of all the isms that have afflicted us, in spite of demagogism on the stump and in legislative halls, this country is rapidly advancing. Our factories are taxed to their utmost with orders, and the wages of their employees have been everywhere voluntarily raised. Prices that have been depressed by the panic are improving. Sinister discontent, with all her imps, is fleeing before the benign presence of prosperity, and in after years the heresies of to-day will only be remembered as a troubled dream. The American people are honest and patriotic. Upon this rock we build our faith, and all the ages and agencies of truth are ours for the superstructure.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this discussion has elicited so many of the arguments upon which the majority of the Committee on Finance have deemed controlling that I do not regard it essential to delay proceedings for the purpose of making any extended dissertation. As far as the silver question is concerned, I have seen no reason to alter the opinions which I expressed in an address delivered in this Chamber on September 21, 1893. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] recently called the attention of the country to the circumstance that gold monometallists, who are ably represented by the minority of the Committee on Finance, have presented nothing; that they are here without a policy and without a suggestion worthy of consideration as a financial plan. They declare that all national obligations must be paid in gold; that although our bonds, notes, etc., are clearly otherwise worded that still, in deference to the sensibilities of the financial world, we must yield our convictions and forego our contractual rights. Perhaps some of us might be willing to give all that we now possess in testimony of our good faith, but even then we would be constrained to entertain gloomy forebodings as to the future.

Everyone concedes that the present financial system is bad. Everyone knows that the sale of bonds in times of peace indicates governmental inefficiency. Were our country void of resources, were our people indolent and brainless, our present embarrassment might be accounted for. No one will claim that silver advocates have had their way. Not only has the legislative department discredited silver, but the executive has practically announced that while gold is constitutional money silver, though similarly mentioned in that instrument, is not to be so considered. And after thus contributing every effort to convince the world that silver can not be used in common with gold we hear complaint that there is a difference in the actual value of the two metals, a difference that does not depend upon production and what has no apparent or actual relationship to the amount of metal in circulation or existence the world over.

The President proposes to retire the greenbacks and to trust the financial affairs of the Government to the national banks. If I read the history of my party correctly, its greatest men, its ablest teachers, have always declared a public debt to be a curse, and have advised the payment of governmental obligations at the earliest practicable moment. The historical reference made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] some days since I shall annex to my remarks in demonstration of this proposition. Whenever the financial affairs of this country are placed absolutely in the keeping of national banks or of any private banking system free government will cease, and wealth resulting from our deliberate misfeasance will rule imperiously and indisputably. Are we prepared to disregard the advice of our revered and patriotic statesmen? The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], if I understand him, does not agree that greenbacks should be destroyed. He would store them in the Treasury. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that as between the two propositions that of the Administration is the more logical, and I notice that the advocates of the gold standard throughout the United States quite generally accept Mr. Cleveland's view.

In his address delivered at the annual meeting of the Board of Trade in the city of Chicago, Mr. William T. Baker, the president of the board, and who referred to the free-coinage advocates as persons afflicted with free-silver lunacy, said:

> In order to maintain the credit of the Government by keeping the parity between gold and silver as required by law, the Treasury must redeem greenbacks and Sherman notes in gold, and this redemption is accompanied by the absurd requirement that such notes must be paid out again and kept in circulation, to be again and again redeemed in gold. This imbecile legislative contrivance has placed us at the mercy of foreign enemies or alien speculators in bullion, and recent events have shown us that such enemies and speculators know their advantage and are not slow to profit by our weakness. There is but one remedy for this deplorable condition of affairs. Provision must be made for the permanent retirement of the five hundred millions of greenbacks and Sherman notes. Long-time bonds, bearing a low rate of interest and payable in gold, should be authorized for this purpose, and if such bonds were permitted to be used by national banks as security for circulation redeemable in gold, they would be quickly absorbed, and the transition would be easily and safely made. All the hoarded gold in the country would immediately come back into circulation, and this country would enter upon an era of unexampled prosperity. There is no politics in this proposition. There is only partisanship, ignorance, and greed opposed to it.

The gentleman whose comments I have read uses this expression: "There is only partisanship, ignorance, and greed opposed to it"—the proposition which he advocates. So-called conservative expressions of this kind with reference to those who in good faith favor the free coinage of silver are heard wherever gold monometallists promulgate their dogmas. We daily peruse in the great newspapers of the gold center of the United States extravagant denunciation of this type. Indeed, Senators who faithfully advocate the principles which for years they have openly avowed and who honestly act in redemption of their promises are derided and accused of misrepresenting the very constituents who elected them because of the opinions which they here reiterate. Because of certain reflections of this nature, I wish to make a few citations from platforms adopted by the Democracy of California.

The money of the Constitution, gold and silver, the only legal tender.—Democratic State Platform, 1876.

That this convention recommends the passage of an act of Congress providing for the free coinage of both gold and silver, by the terms of which act all gold and silver bullion offered at the several mints of the United States shall be received in exchange for money, or gold or silver certificates at the rate now fixed by law for standard dollars of gold or silver, which certificates shall be receivable for all public purposes and interchangeable for gold or silver, as the case may be.—Democratic State Platform, 1886.

A depleted Treasury, the imposition of unequal and oppressive taxes, the effort to enact coercive legislation, the arbitrary disregard by the Speaker of the House of Representatives of all parliamentary rules, and the shameless servility displayed by the majority in the House of Representatives in yielding ready obedience to his tyrannical mandates, their refusal to join the Democracy in its efforts to procure the passage of a measure permitting the free coinage of silver.—Democratic State Platform, 1890.

Over one of these conventions I had the honor to preside, and in another instance I was the chairman of the committee on resolutions. In every instance I voted for the platforms from which these citations are made.

I take it to be a fact that the only proposition offered for the rehabilitation of our financial system by those who are opposed to the views held by the majority of the Finance Committee is that which involves either the retiring or hoarding of greenbacks, the withdrawal from circulation and the substitution of the national bank for the Government in the regulation and control of our financial system. I will not elaborate upon the consequences of this condition. The obviously fatal tendency of such a scheme has been most fully presented here. In the first place we would suffer from a most ruinous contraction. Notwithstanding all the inducements that have been heretofore offered to the national banks, they have but a comparatively small amount of circulation, and many of them have manifested a disposition to retire much of this. It is certain that they would never, if they procured the contemplated additional privilege, supply money equal in amount to that which our friends proposed to destroy or withdraw; and the utter futility of maintaining a gold basis in this country would give rise to disaster and bring about the further centralization of gold and all the direful consequences of a congested and inadequate currency.

Speaking from Democratic ground, I may be permitted to say that I do not understand how any follower of Jefferson or Jackson can stand the new departure which the Administration insists we shall adopt. Platform after platform of our party, year in and year out, has been so drawn as to call the attention of the world to the criminal subserviency of the Republican organization to the national banking system, and yet now we are to meekly follow not only the financial leaders of that organization, but are to submit ourselves absolutely to the dictation of those who have thus been selected to determine the volume of our currency and whether we shall have an adequate money supply. I know of no tyranny more odious than that which has thus been partially established and which it is proposed to deliberately fasten upon the people of the United States.

I have before me a work called the Democratic Campaign Book. It is a document which was issued by the Congressional Committee of the Democratic party in 1890 and contains the arguments upon which it was hoped the party might gain an important contest.

REPUBLICAN FAVORITISM FOR NATIONAL BANKS—AN ACT TO CREATE AND DONATE $15,000,000 TO THESE PETS—INCREASING CIRCULATION TO PAR VALUE OF BONDS DEPOSITED.

Mr. Dorsey, Republican (Nebraska), introduced in this Congress the following bill:

"A substitute for bill No. 537 to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of any United States bonds bearing interest in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in the whole amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. And that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

January 29 an attempt was made to push the bill through without discussion. Mr. Bland objected to the consideration of the bill, and the ayes and noes were taken, which resulted in the bill being then taken up for one hour's discussion. The vote on the question of consideration stood thus:

Yeas—Democrats 18; Republicans 125.

Nays—Democrats 103; Republicans 9.

Under the present law national banks are allowed to issue circulation up to 90 per cent of the par value of Government bonds held by them. This bill is to allow them to increase their circulation to the full par value of the bonds.

Under existing law these banks are the owners of $145,000,000 of bonds, and their circulation, based on these bonds, is $128,000,000. Bonds are far above par, due in a large measure to the demand upon the part of banks for these securities as a basis of circulation, and the immediate and intended effect of this bill is to increase the value of the assets of the banks.

Upon the passage of the bill the banks could, without the purchase of another bond, issue $15,000,000 more of notes. That is to say, the bill is a Republican proposition to make the banks a present of $15,000,000 to be loaned out to borrowers at any rate of interest that necessity may compel the borrowers to pay.

The further and necessary effect is, of course, to increase to the extent of the increase of circulation the power of the banks to expand and contract the currency.

This is another instance of Republican friendship toward the banks, and a corresponding act of unfriendliness toward silver.

This bill has not been finally voted upon in the House, but it and several others containing like propositions are still pending there, while in the Senate JOHN SHERMAN has another on the Calendar awaiting the coming of the second session of this Congress.

The following Republican expressions made during the hour's debate on this bill are sufficiently indicative of the purpose of the Republican party to enable the people to judge as to the probable result should that party be retained in power.

Mr. Dorsey of Nebraska: Now, if the House passes this bill it will be an encouragement for the national banks to continue to hold the bonds that they are holding to-day at a positive loss and it will give them cause to hope that this Congress will pass such a measure as will perpetuate the national banking system of the country. I know it was popular some years ago, especially in the West, to cry out against national banks, but I am happy to say that day has passed.

Mr. Conger of Iowa, chairman of Coinage, Weights, and Measures: Why, gentlemen, I am in favor of any measure that will do any public good in this country, even if it should make a few men rich.

Suppose the national banks do receive some benefit from this proposition. The national banking system, in my judgment and in that of the civilized people of this world, is the best that history has ever known. This will tend in some measure to perpetuate that system; but, gentlemen, I know you do not like the national banking system; you never did like it; I do not suppose you ever will. It was a Republican measure; and it is the highest compliment that has ever been made to the history of the Republican government of this country.

So far the Democrats have, with the assistance of a very few Republicans, been able to prevent the passage of any of these bills, but the Republican who was most in sympathy with them has not been renominated, and should they be in the minority in the coming election the bill will certainly pass.

A proposition of like nature was made in the Fiftieth Congress, but the Democratic majority ignored it entirely, and it was never even considered.

Those upon whom Democratic orators thus instructed impressed these views are not disposed to abandon their convictions, no matter from whom the solicitation or mandate may come.

Mr. President, I desire to say at this point that in my judgment no compromise is possible. The Sherman and Bland-Allison acts were failures. These were compromises. A bill which I might almost call immaterial regarding the coinage of the seigniorage was vetoed, thus indicating that the Executive did not believe that any concession whatever should be made, and after all, with the views which that distinguished officer entertains, his veto of that bill should have been anticipated. His sentiments have been expressed uniformly. He has not changed. He has been consistent. This is more than can be said of many who have followed in the pathway which he has, as far as the Democracy is concerned, pioneered.

Now and then some one comes upon the scene who thinks he has a programme which will solve all difficulties. An idea of this kind is embodied in a resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] concerning the coinage of the American product.

Upon principle no free-coinage man can vote for such a proposition, because the moment that a discrimination of any kind or character is made against silver, the moment its use is limited or a peculiar burden imposed upon it, whenever an avenue of usefulness is opened to one metal not permitted to the other, that moment bimetallism as we understand it ceases and the true theory is abandoned.

But there is another reason independent of this which absolutely interdicts the success of the idea advanced in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER]. This I will illustrate by the following quotation from the Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792–1894. The article has reference to the significant experience of Venezuela:

PROHIBITION OF THE IMPORTATION OF SILVER COIN.

The Venezuelan Government issued the following decree on the 14th of August, 1893:

1. From and after this date the importation of Venezuelan silver coin through the customs stations of the Republic is prohibited, except when the same is imported by the Government. The import of all foreign silver coin is also prohibited by law.

2. The collectors of customs in seaport towns shall consider all silver coins, inclusive of Venezuelan silver coins, which it is sought to import into the country as articles whose importation is prohibited, and persons found guilty of such attempted importation shall be punished by the confiscation of the coin and a fine equal to 50 per cent of its value.

The reasons for the issuance of this decree are explained by Mr. E. A. Plumacher, our consul at Maracaibo, in the following words:

"At this moment, when the silver question is attracting universal attention, it may interest the Department to know that for some time past there have been imported into this country large quantities of Venezuelan silver coins which have been discovered to be of unauthorized coinage.

"Since 1886 the importation of foreign silver of all nationalities has been prohibited, but all classes of gold coins and Venezuelan silver have until now been allowed free entry and are constantly being introduced through the custom-houses. It now appears that parties abroad, taking advantage of the low price of silver bullion, have coined hundreds of thousands of Venezuelan silver dollars, exact facsimiles of the emission authorized by the Government, and containing an equal, or, as it is said, even a greater amount of pure silver.

"The Government has acted promptly in the matter and issued a decree prohibiting the importation from abroad, except by the Government, of Venezuelan silver coins, and declaring them contraband should efforts be made to introduce them. This will put a stop to the business through the custom-houses, but large amounts will no doubt continue to be successfully smuggled.

"It is a striking commentary on the situation that such a speculation is possible, producing, it is said, nearly 40 per cent profit, although it is freely admitted that the surreptitious coins are in all respects equal to those authorized by law.

"Advices from Curaçao, which is and always has been a dumping ground for money of all nationalities, show that Venezuelan silver, since the late developments, is received at only one-half its face value; moreover, it is intimated that it will soon be rejected entirely."—Consular Reports, November, 1892, p. 321.

In the last Congress we reduced the tariff upon opium 50 per cent because of the circumstance that opium was readily and most successfully smuggled—the profit of the illegal traffic being so great. Silver, of course, would be much more easily brought into this country, and the evils resulting would be intolerable. But the main objection is that first stated. It ought to be conclusive upon those who are really anxious for the restoration of silver.

It has been said that the remedy for all our ills is an increased revenue, and that the passage of a bill to add $40,000,000 to the income of the Government will put us upon a satisfactory basis. The same individuals who favor the tariff bill favor the bond bill. They say that we must have the revenue and also the proceeds of the bonds, and still they tell us that if we have the revenue we do not need the bonds. The records plainly show that the deficiency is something less for the last year than the amount proposed to be raised by the new emergency horizontal tariff bill, and still we must, it is declared (and this sentiment is echoed by all the gold monometallists), have both bonds and revenue. And now comes the Republican section of the gold monometallists and informs us that the difficulty consists wholly in a lack of revenue. I think that a majority on this floor are opposed to issuing bonds at all. These Senators believe that such issuance is entirely unnecessary, and that there is enough of coin at the disposition of the Government, or which can be made available to meet current demands. If it is undesirable to raise money by issuing bonds because of the burden to be thus put upon the people, is it not also undesirable to tax the people to such an extent that the same amount of money will, in fact, be squeezed out of them? If a hundred millions of dollars is necessary it is a question how that money should be obtained. Are the people of the United States prepared to supply it by means of taxation? Is it not a fact that the general sentiment is that gold obtained either as the result of taxation or the issuance of bonds is not needed? Our friends assert that gold is essential; that we must have gold, and that we will have plenty of it if the revenue laws are amended properly. After all, the money is to come from the people. The burden is to be imposed in one form or the other. If we do not run in debt it will be because we contribute cash from our own individual resources instead of supplying it upon the strength of governmental promise. If we are to have a gold standard, and if we are to further debase silver, Mr. Cleveland is right. He should have authority to issue gold bonds; he should retire all greenbacks and Sherman notes, and the crisis will then have been reached. Where the gold is to come from to maintain us in such a contingency is to me a mystery.

Our friends of the opposition assert and reiterate that those who favor free coinage are really silver monometallists. This accusation is unfounded, in view of the fact that we ask nothing for silver that is not accorded to gold. We seek to impose no new money upon this country or upon the world. We ask that the gold and silver which constitutes the coin referred to, not only in the Constitution, but also in our obligations, shall be used honestly and carefully and patriotically by the Treasury in such a way as to maintain the parity of both by ignoring the potency of neither. To assert that the Government is aiding the cause of silver when it announces that silver is not money save in a restricted sense, and by continually warning Congress against its recognition, is as unreasonable as it is contrary to instruction of the Constitution. The attempt to evade the explicit wording of our bonds and the force of the Matthews resolution, by the pretense that the act declaring that the parity must be maintained requires the Treasurer to ignore silver, can not be entertained in good faith by sensible men.

Those who favor the committee's amendment admit that it would be difficult under an Administration holding the financial views which dominate Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet and which controlled Mr. Harrison's management of public affairs to fairly enforce a free-coinage law. Such a law should be dealt with by its friends. Day by day, hour by hour, the return to what can be truly called sound money is made more and more embarrassing, though such return is certain and the continuance of existing conditions impossible. I have no doubt that free coinage, supplemented by efforts made in good faith by officers honestly and earnestly seeking to establish bimetallism, would be rewarded by the accomplishment of every promise made by the advocates of silver, and that the results of such exertions would be that coin would be paid on demand and gold and silver taken indiscriminately and without injury to the condition of the Treasury. It is not the aim of the silver advocates to force silver only upon a creditor, but we believe that the debtor has some rights, and that when there is a deliberate attempt by speculators, backed by tributary newspapers, to bankrupt the national Treasury through such invasions as we have recently witnessed, the Government should announce that it will exercise its option for its own interest, as of right it may do. It is true that money is timid and that financiers must often be treated in the most tender and careful manner to avoid harrowing their feelings. They are touchy. But while recognizing this situation we must draw the line somewhere. There is a point beyond which self-respect and self-defense forbid us to go, and a time must come when the Government will control money matters and will refuse to subject itself to the personal and private demands of those whose impudent dictations it now tolerates.

In an address delivered in this Chamber on the 22d of last month the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] made several very interesting statements regarding the foreign trade of England, and showed from publications contained in the Statist and London Economist that the foreign trade of the United Kingdom was more profitable in 1895 than at any time in the history of that country. The Senator upon the same occasion called attention to the fact that our policy is building up in Asiatic countries a competition which can not be met. As bearing upon this proposition, I call the attention of the Senate to a report made by our consul-general at Shanghai, Mr. Jernigan, and contained on pages 93 and following, of volume 50, No. 184, Consular Reports. The article is entitled "Labor and wages in China." I quote:

LABOR AND WAGES IN CHINA.

No country in the world is more abundantly supplied with labor than China, and in no country in the world does the laborer receive less compensation. A Chinese laborer will save money on wages that would hardly be sufficient to supply the absolute necessities of an American laborer. This is made possible by the cheapness of the vegetable diet on which the Chinese laborer is content to live; the small cost of house accommodations, for several families will subdivide one room of a house and live in contentment in it, and the low price paid for clothing, which is made of the coarsest cottons. But the cheapness of labor in China does not mean that the products of that labor are inferior in quality. The Japanese laborer, receiving higher wages, is more artistic in his work—his productions are more finished; in dyes and in the blending of colors he is superior to his Chinese rival, but in substantial and lasting quality the latter is fully the equal and in some instances the superior.

The silk that comes from the looms of Japan compares in gloss and fineness with any in the world, and Japanese crapes have a reputation in almost every market for softness of beauty and harmony of color; but for substantial wear, for lasting quality, the silk goods of China are most favorably known to the merchants of all lands.

Among western nations the impression prevailed at one time that Asiatic races were more imitative than original, and that in the industrial departments, where originality was the chief element of success, the Occident need not fear the Orient as a rival. The test has been made, and the result has greatly modified if not entirely removed the impression. Within the last quarter of a century Japan has thrown off a most oppressive form of feudalism and advanced to the forefront as a nation of progressive ideas. Twenty-five years ago a system of government obtained in Japan which discouraged all liberal enterprise. Centuries of political slavery, intrenched in formidable prejudices, seemed to have crushed out the very soul of the Japanese people, and the Empire was dominated by the tyranny of great feudal chiefs, the remains of whose castles, now scattered over Japan, attest to the traveler the strength and wealth of the former owners and the servitude and poverty of their retainers.

All has given place to an enlarged liberty. With the adoption of a written constitution, the Japanese mind began to develop more rapidly, and in defining, by a written law, the organic structure of his Empire, the Emperor of Japan not only did what no other Asiatic ruler has ever done, but caused a new era to dawn upon Japan.

The gates of the Empire of Japan, so long closed to the Westerner, were opened to his coming, and the Japanese soon learned to appreciate and utilize the productions of Western thought and skill. To-day, the navy-yards, arsenals, factories, banks, and large commercial houses of Japan prove that there is in Japanese character a reserve force which is destined, if judiciously regulated and directed, to assure still greater achievements in industrial fields. The attestations are too numerous to leave doubt that the Japanese are not only original in conception, but possess the power of concentration and execution.

* * * * * * *

And the problem of China's awakening should not be solved without the intelligent influence of the business men of the United States. The solution will involve more intimate and valuable trade relations with western nations, as well as define such relations in their future extent and value. Occupying the more favored geographical position, the United States can and should send to China much of their overproductions in exchange, if not absolute sales, for those of China's products that may be needed.

During the last fiscal year the value of the trade relations between Japan and the United States was estimated, in round numbers, at $28,000,000, but the figures show a balance against the United States of $19,000,000. Japan is nearer to the United States than any other Western nation, and several thousand miles nearer than Great Britain, and yet the balance sheet, for comparison, between Japan and Great Britain shows a balance in favor of the latter about as large as the balance against the United States.

During the same period, the value of the aggregate trade relations between China and the United States was estimated at $24,000,000, with a balance against the United States of $16,000,000, while in China, as in Japan, Great Britain checks off large balances in her favor, although more remote from China by thousands of miles.

The population of China is many times larger than the population of Japan, and with the varied productions of the United States there ought to be a much more valuable trade with China. This consideration should be regarded as of special importance at a time when the symptoms of political and commercial changes in China appear so clearly, even on the surface. When the 400,000,000 Chinese feel the influence of Western civilization they will, as their Japanese neighbors have done, acquire and assimilate in many respects the habits and desires of the Westerner, and the United States should be prepared to supply their share of the demands.

European nations are sustaining the efforts of European merchants more substantially than the American merchant is sustained. The latter, in the competition for Asiatic trade, has to rely upon his own skill and energy, while the merchants of Europe are encouraged by the aid given to the great steamship lines which carry their flags and pour the productions of Europe into Asiatic ports. At the port of Shanghai, the great commercial and distributing center of Asiatic trade, Great Britain, France, and Germany have direct mail and commercial communication—the steamers entering and leaving the port every week, carrying the flags of their respective nationalities, while no ship carrying the American mail and flying the Stars and Stripes touches at Shanghai at all. The American merchant must often unduly wait for his mail after its arrival at Yokohama, and send his purchases in foreign bottoms to the ports of his native land. The trade relations of the United States with China can not be satisfactorily enlarged until American merchants are secured a more advantageous position. They can not successfully compete for Asiatic trade, even with the natural advantages of their geographical position, when such advantages are so greatly neutralized by such resources and means at the command of their competitors as referred to.

Mr. President, it is too late at this time to enter into a discussion of the arguments made yesterday and at different times during this debate to the effect that gold has not appreciated. In this connection I beg leave to quote certain remarks made by me when speaking upon this same subject in the address delivered in the Senate in 1893. I then said:

To begin with, these gentlemen all admit that a certain quantity of gold will now buy about 50 per cent more of the necessaries of life than could have been purchased with the same amount of the same metal at the time of the demonetization of silver in 1873. But they contend that this is due to improved machinery, to new and more economical methods of production. I think that the address made by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] at the opening of this discussion disposes of this subject, and I will not spend much time discussing it. I have had the pleasure of listening to arguments wherein it was stated that wages are higher now than ever, and that hence it follows that gold had not fallen. It may well be doubted whether there is any foundation for this assertion, save in a very limited classification, but assuming it to be true that wages are higher with reference to certain industries, that increase is obviously attributable to other causes.

But if wages have increased is such increase due to the monometallic standard, and must wages depreciate because of the Sherman law? Are we to suppose that no other cause or causes influenced wages in this country than the action of our Government regarding currency? During the last campaign gentlemen who now sit in this Chamber were preaching Democracy to assembled multitudes, and they never gave as a reason for appreciation of wages the argument they rely upon here. Do they still hold to their older and oft-asserted view? Is it true that wages have appreciated merely because we demonetized silver?

I well remember that we all contended, and I think with much force, that the well-organized exertions of trades unions had much to do with keeping up labor prices. No general rule can be applied to this matter from which any such deduction as that insisted upon by the Senator from Delaware is authorized. In the same States for the same class of labor and the same number of hours different rates are charged. North, South, East, and West prices vary, depending often upon the mere ability of the laborer to obtain his rights, and in some instances of the employer to procure his work to be done at a reasonable rate.

* * * * * * *

One of the most distinguished monometallists of Great Britain is Mr. Giffen, chief of the statistical department of the board of trade, and although he has not seen fit in his later work to republish the views I am about to quote, I desire, nevertheless, to quote an abstract from his paper entitled, "Recent changes in prices and incomes compared." He there positively places himself upon record in support of the proposition that gold has notably appreciated, and, moreover, he argued that this appreciation was likely to continue, and that therein was found the true explanation of the fall in the price of commodities.

In 1879 he pointed out that this rise would soon become evident. Let me quote:

"If the test of prophecy be the event, there was never surely a better forecast. The fall of prices in such a general way as to amount to what is known as a rise in the purchasing power of gold is generally, I might almost say universally, admitted. Measured by any commodity or group of commodities usually taken as the measure for such a purpose, gold is undoubtedly possessed of more purchasing power than was the case fifteen or twenty years ago, and this high purchasing power has been continued over a long enough period to allow for all minor oscillations."

* * * * * * * *

The Senator from Delaware argues, as do many of the authorities, that the fall in the value of the various commodities is due to the great development which has been made in the arts, and he calls attention to Bessemer steel as a notable instance. So it is a notable instance, and so far as steel is concerned, it is clearly established that improved methods have lessened the cost; and there are many similar cases.

If the fall in prices was due to improvements in machinery the prices would be maintained with reference to those articles regarding which there had been no improvements affecting production, and in cases where inventions and new appliances had diminished the cost the depreciation would be noticed. But we know that there has been a uniform fall of prices all along the line, and the tables and charts prepared by eminent statisticians clearly prove that the drop has been general and is therefore due to some cause utterly different from that to which Sir John Lubbock and others attribute it. For instance, let us take wool, at present very low. My Republican friends may say that this is because our people are afraid of tariff changes. Let us so assume, and take a date anterior to the triumph of the Democratic ticket, and it will be found that then wool was exceedingly dull throughout the country, and on the Pacific Coast, where the staple is short, owing to the circumstance that we are compelled to clip twice a year, wool was so low prior to Mr. Cleveland's election that it did not even reach the duty line.

It is untrue that the expense of woolgrowing has become less and less as years have rolled by. When a child I have seen thousands of sheep roaming over the public domain, the pasturage of which cost the man who owned them not a cent. Gradually, as the progressive American moved over this territory and took it up under the homestead and preemption laws, the ranges were curtailed and the sheep were driven back, so that now many of them subsist at certain seasons on the mountain sides, sometimes at an altitude of from 8,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea, there seeking with difficulty that support before readily obtained. Hence the expense of maintenance has increased. Besides, lands have become useful for other purposes, and the sheep in the West is becoming more and more a burden.

Therefore there is depression not alone in those lines concerning which the cost of production is lessened, but it is found all throughout the list, demonstrating to you as legislative physicians that some other prescription must be applied than that suggested by the Senators who are opposed to me.

I believe that a careful analysis of the situation will show numerous examples which can not be explained upon the basis expressed in the ably conducted argument of the Senator from Delaware. I have not had time to carefully scan this branch of our dispute, but have said enough to suggest a conclusion. In the matter of eggs there has not been any invention promoting production. The ancient methods are still utilized. And yet I find there the same depreciation.

It has been frequently stated, and truly, that the gold price of silver prior to 1873 was remarkably stable, and that since that time it has been utterly unstable. But the theory that silver has depreciated and gold remained stable does not account for admitted phenomena. I refer to the phenomena which I have just recited. Suppose that we adopt a gold standard, pure and simple, manifestly when gold is very plentiful it will buy fewer things, and this is called a rise in prices. When gold is scarce it will buy more of everything. This means a fall in prices. There is no mystery as to this. The experience of every gold-standard country in the world discloses a universal fall in the prices of commodities.

And let it be remembered—and it is a most cogent circumstance—that this depreciation does not antedate 1873. If we are trying this case upon its merits, and are to enter a judgment upon it, let us look at the evidence. The rule suggested by the other side does not apply, because the fall is universal and the diminished cost of production is not universal.

Then we have this other significant feature, that the fall in the price of commodities dates from 1873 or thereabouts—the date of the demonetization of silver. Why is this remarkable coincidence presented? There may be some means other than that hinted at to account for it. I am not here to withhold any information. I know that I am obliged to bring forth every fact that will tend to elucidate. The truth should be known that we may legislate wisely and in the interest of the people whom we represent. I can not find and have not heard any explanation, in harmony with the gold-appreciation theory, of the incidents which I have cited.

In China, where gold is a mere commodity and is sold just as lead or tin would be in this country, prices have not varied in twenty years. This information I derive from an article quoted in the San Francisco Chronicle and written by W. S. Wetmore for the Hongkong papers. Mr. Wetmore selected some twenty articles for his index numbers and discovered that the prices had been practically stationary since 1873, while gold had risen nearly 50 per cent.

In a recent article by the same gentleman, printed in the North China News, he shows that notwithstanding the enormous depreciation in the gold price of silver in Europe, America, and India, there has been no variation of importance in either China or Japan. He gives an instance within his own personal experience to illustrate his meaning. Seventeen years ago he employed a boy, at a salary of twenty-one Mexican dollars a month, and although at the present time silver is worth in gold less than a third of its former price,

Mr. Wetmore has discovered that his servant is able to live now just as well as he did in 1876, and has not deprived himself of any of the advantages which he then enjoyed, although, as I have said, commodities have not fallen.

At the risk of being tautological, I will say that in all the great silver-using countries of the world an ounce of silver will buy just as much of the necessities of life at this day as could have been bought twenty years ago. If gold is declared to be the standard of the world, and if it is said that there is no other kind of money, gold will be more sought for, there will be greater need for it, its purchasing power will necessarily increase.

If half the stock of gold were destroyed, no one doubts that the remaining portion would be more valuable. And so if the use to which gold is applied be made more extended, if it becomes more essential to the public comfort, so will we be more anxious to get it, so will its purchasing power develop. This subject was very ably and thoroughly discussed by the distinguished Senator from Nevada in his argument before the Brussels conference. Indeed, he left nothing to be said upon the subject. The man who insists that the less money we have in the world the better off we are is no more inconsistent than the party who admits, as he must, that the legislation of the world has been in favor of gold, and that metal has been cornered and placed in a few hands, and still insists that its purchasing power has not increased.

A very instructive and interesting article on this topic by the Mexican minister, Mr. Romero, can be found in the June (1895) number of the North American Review.

It is sufficient to say in general of this measure that no doubt there are large interests in the United States which might be affected adversely by the free coinage of silver. Those whose business it has been to reduce the value of that metal and who have been growing wealthier day by day in consequence of that policy will realize reduced profits with corresponding gain to the public at large. Those whose monetary and selfish programme has been thus far followed, and whose power has been, unfortunately and I trust but temporarily, fastened upon the American people, can not be expected to willingly release the great advantages which have accrued to them. They necessarily struggle; they necessarily denounce. The newspapers which they own and to whose support they largely contribute also join in the calumniating cry. But those of us who believe in free coinage, and who have uniformly and fearlessly asserted our views in that direction, are not to be deterred from the discharge of our duties by either threats or prophecies of personal calamity.

While the change proposed would bring about some disturbance, we must recollect that business affairs are far from settled now. The great gulf that separates the poor and the rich is daily becoming more and more pronounced. While not interfering with property rights, we must recognize prevailing conditions. I do not apprehend anarchy, revolution, or kindred horrors. Milder remedies are within reach. If the wrongs to which I refer really prevail, if my conclusions are well founded, the people have the power in their hands to redress their grievances.

It is to be hoped that the true solution will be reached, that those arguments upon which we have relied and in which we have full faith will be controlling at the polls. The American people, Mr. President, have not lost their right to vote. If they are suffering it is their own fault, not deliberate, perhaps, not willful, it is true, but nevertheless the consequence of misconception because of inattention or the result of neglect.

The true American who has faith in the system under which he lives has the utmost confidence that all political issues, whether economic or other, will be solved justly and patriotically. Even those whom the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] informs us do not understand financial problems because of engrossing cares and arduous occupation, have, I think, more knowledge of the real nature of our troubles and certainly more disposition to redress them than many more favorably surrounded. The masses will soon unite, not for blood and lawlessness, but in the peaceful and determined effort to enforce at the ballot box those policies which, however odious to gold monopolists, are essential to the happiness and comfort of the people.

APPENDIX.

DEMOCRATIC AUTHORITY ON BONDS AND NATIONAL BANKS.

National-bank notes shall be retired, their further issue prohibited, and United States Treasury notes substituted therefor. The power to issue paper money and coin as a legal tender is only vested in the National Government. Arkansas, 1878.

COLORADO.

In 1878 Colorado denounced "the retirement and destruction of legal-tender notes and the maintenance of the national banking system," and said: "No further increase in the bonded debt and no further sale of bonds for the purchase of coin for resumption purposes; a gradual extinction of the public debt by the redemption of the interest-bearing portion thereof in such currency as the law will permit."

ILLINOIS.

That the present system of national banks can and should be abolished at once, and the notes of such institutions redeemed and their place relieved by noninterest-bearing notes of the Government, thus saving to the people annually $20,000,000.—Illinois State Democratic platform, 1868.

That it is the exclusive prerogative of the United States to issue all bills to circulate as money, and a right which ought not to be exercised by any State or corporation. That the national-bank notes should be redeemed, and instead thereof there should be issued by the Government an equal amount of Treasury notes.—Illinois State Democratic platform, 1878.

INDIANA.

That the national-bank system organized in the interest of bondholders ought to be abolished and Un ited States notes substituted in lieu of the national-bank currency, thus saving to the people in interest alone more than $18,000,000 a year; and, until such system of banks be abolished, we demand that the shares of such banks in Indiana shall be subject to the same taxation, State and municipal, as other property of the State.—Indiana Democratic State platform, 1868.

We are in favor of the repeal of the national-bank law and the substitution of greenbacks for the national-bank currency.—Indiana State Democratic platform, 1874.

1876: We declare in favor of the adoption of measures looking to the gradual retirement of the circulation of the national banks and the substitution therefor of circulating notes issued by the authorities of Government.

1878: The right to issue paper money as well as coin is the exclusive prerogative of the Government. * * * We demand that the national-bank notes shall be retired, and in lieu thereof shall be issued by the Government an equal amount of Treasury notes with full legal-tender quality.

IOWA.

That the national-bank system, organized in the interest of bondholders, ought to be abolished and United States notes substituted in lieu of the national-bank currency, thus saving to the people in interest alone more than $18,000,000 annually; and, until such system of banks shall be abolished, we demand that the shares of such banks in Iowa shall be subject to the same taxes, State and municipal, as other property of the State.—Iowa State Democratic platform, 1868.

1869: A national debt is a national curse.

1875: We favor a sufficient supply of national currency for business purposes. Opposition to the present national banking law.

1876: The resumption law should at once be repealed.

1877: We favor the retention of a greenback currency, and declare against any further contraction, and we favor substitution of greenbacks for national-bank bills.

We deprecate the funding of our noninterest-bearing debt. * * * We oppose any further retirement of the United States notes now in circulation, and favor the substitution of national Treasury notes for national-bank bills.—Iowa State Democratic platform, 1878.

1879: We are in favor of the substitution of United States Treasury notes for national-bank notes, and of the abolition of national banks as banks of issue. * * * We favor a reduction of the bonded debt as fast as practicable and the application of the idle money in the Treasury to that purpose.

KANSAS.

We demand the repeal of the national-bank law, and that the Government shall issue a legal-tender currency direct from the Treasury.—Kansas State Democratic platform, 1874.

1876: We demand that the act of Congress creating the national banking system be repealed; that the notes of the national banks be withdrawn from circulation, and in lieu thereof the paper of the Government of the United States be substituted. That as Congress has the sole power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, it should also have the sole power to provide a paper currency for the people.

1876: We are opposed to all banks of issue, whether chartered by Congress or the State legislature, and we desire that banking on the part of corporations or private individuals shall be confined by law exclusively to exchange, discounts, and deposit.

That as Congress has sole power to coin money and regulate the value thereof under the Constitution, it should also exercise the sole power of providing a paper currency to be used as money. * * * That we favor the retirement of national-bank notes and substitution of Treasury notes, commonly called greenbacks, in their stead.—Kansas State Democratic platform, 1878.

LOUISIANA.

1878: The Louisiana Democracy demands that the national banking system should be abolished and national-bank notes retired, and in lieu thereof that the Government of the United States should issue an equal amount of Treasury notes, commonly known as greenbacks.

MASSACHUSETTS.

1868: Every dollar received by taxation from the people not absolutely necessary for the economical and legitimate expenses of the Government to be applied to the payment of the public debt.

1877: Resolved, That the practice of borrowing money for other objects than those of strict public necessity has generated schemes of extravagant expenditure, until taxation has become well-nigh an intolerable burden. Honesty, economy, and "pay as we go" should be the rule in all the appropriations of the people's money. The power of the State, counties, cities, and towns to borrow money ought to be rigidly limited, so that an end may be put to the system which "anticipates the labor of coming ages and appropriates the fruits of it in advance; which coins the industry of future generations into cash and snatches the inheritance from children yet unborn."

MICHIGAN.

1879: We demand that all money, whether paper or metallic, shall be issued by the General Government only, and made a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, except as to such contracts heretofore made as were originally payable in coin. We are opposed to all banks of issue, and demand that greenbacks shall be substituted in place of national-bank bills.

MINNESOTA.

1878: We are opposed to any increase of the bonded debt, and to the sale of bonds for the purpose of obtaining coin for resumption purposes. We are in favor of the gradual substitution of national Treasury notes for national-bank notes and making such Treasury notes the sole paper currency of the country, and placed on such basis as that the same shall be equal in value with coin, and as a legal tender the same as coin.

MISSOURI.

We regard the national banking system as being oppressive and burdensome, and demand the abolition and retirement from circulation of all national-bank notes and the issue of legal-tender notes in lieu thereof, and in quantities from time to time sufficient to supply the wholesome and necessary business demands of the entire country, and that all greenbacks so issued shall be used in the purchase and retirement of the bonds of the United States, so that the interest-bearing debt of the country may be lessened to the extent of the greenbacks thus put into circulation.—Missouri State Democratic platform, 1878.

MAINE.

That so long as the currency consists in whole or in part of paper money, issued under the authority of the National Government, such paper should be issued directly by the Government itself, and that the great and valuable privilege of issuing three hundred millions of this money, yielding a profit equal to eighteen millions annually in gold, has been too long enjoyed by favored individuals associated under the national-bank law, and should be forthwith assumed by the people represented by the political authority of the United States.—Maine State Democratic platform, 1868.

1878: The payment of the bonded debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable. No further issue of Government bonds whereby equal taxation with the other property of the country is avoided. * * * We are opposed to an irredeemable currency, but believe in a currency for the Government and people, the laborer and officeholder, the pensioner and soldier, the producer and the bondholder. We are opposed to the present national banking system and in favor of the gradual substitution of greenbacks for national-bank bills.

NEBRASKA.

1878: We demand the gradual substitution of United States legal-tender paper for national-bank notes and its permanent establishment as the sole paper money of the country; the immediate repeal of the national banking act; no further issue of interest-bearing bonds; no further sale of bonds for the purchase of coin for resumption purposes, but a gradual extinction of the public debt.

NEVADA.

The substitution of the United States currency for the national-bank notes. No further sale of interest-bearing bonds for coin for resumption purposes, but the gradual reduction of the public debt.—Nevada State Democratic platform, 1878.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

1878: One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the officeholder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder. That whatever currency is issued by the Government should be issued for the benefit of the whole people, and not for the benefit of capitalists at the expense of the people.

OHIO.

1869: We denounce the national banking system as one of the worst outgrowths of the bonded debt, which unnecessarily increases the burden of the people $30,000,000 annually, and we demand its immediate repeal.

1870: We are opposed to the system of national banks, and demand the immediate repeal of the law creating them, and that in place of the notes of such banks Treasury notes of the United States should be substituted.

1871: Honor and duty alike require the honest payment of the public debt.

Believing that a better system can be devised, and one that will be free from unjust privileges, we are in favor of abolishing the franchises of the national banks to issue a paper currency as soon as the same can safely and prudently be done, and that the notes so withdrawn by the banks be replaced by the Government with legal-tender currency.—Ohio State Democratic platform, 1874.

1875: That the policy already initiated by the Republican party of abolishing the legal tender and giving national banks the power to furnish all the currency will increase the power of an already dangerous monopoly and the enormous burden now oppressing the people, without any corresponding advantage, and that we oppose the policy and demand that all the national-bank circulation be promptly and permanently retired, and legal tenders be issued in their place. * * * No paper currency except such as may be issued directly by and upon the faith of the General Government.

1876: The gradual but early substitution of legal-tender for national-bank notes. * * * The issue by the General Government alone of all the circulating medium, whether paper or metallic.

1877: We favor the retention of greenback currency as the best paper money we have ever had, and declare against any further contraction. * * * We favor the issue by the General Government alone of all circulating mediums, whether paper or metallic, to be always of equal tender and interconvertible.

1878: The gradual substitution of United States legal-tender paper for national-bank notes and its permanent establishment as the sole paper money of the country. * * * No further increase in the bonded debt and no further sale of bonds for the purchase of coin for resumption purposes, but the gradual extinction of the public debt.

1879: The issue of money in any form and the regulation thereof belong to the General Government alone, and ought not to be delegated or intrusted to individuals or corporations. We oppose the perpetuation of the present national banking system as a means of control over the currency of the country, and demand the gradual substitution of Treasury notes for national-bank currency.

OREGON.

1875: The institution of the system of national banks was a fraud upon the country and an injustice upon the laboring classes, and we demand such prudent legislation as will gradually bring this vicious system to a close; that all currency which may be issued shall be convertible into coin upon demand and be issued directly by the Government.

That the gratuity of nearly $24,000,000 now paid to national banks by the Government is simply levying tribute upon the people for the benefit of the capitalists. We therefore favor the repeal of the law under which they were established and the direct issue by the Government of currency, receivable for all public dues, sufficient to supply the place of the present bank-note circulation.—Oregon State Democratic platform, 1878.

PENNSYLVANIA.

1875: That the policy already indicated by the Republican party of abolishing legal tenders and giving the national banks the power to furnish all the currency will increase the power of an already dangerous monopoly and the enormous burden now oppressing the people without compensating advantage, and that all the national-bank circulation be promptly and permanently retired and full legal tenders be issued in their place.

1875: The honest payment of our just debts and the sacred preservation of the public faith.

1876: The honest payment of the public debt.

1878: Gold, silver, and United States legal-tender notes at par therewith are a just basis for paper circulation.

NEW YORK.

1874: Honest payment of the public debt in coin.

TENNESSEE.

That we favor the abolition of the present odious national-bank system and the payment of the bonds of the Government by issuance of its non-interest-bearing notes, according to the contract expressed and implied at the time of the creation of such obligations.—Tennessee Democratic State platform, 1874.

The substitution of Treasury notes for national-bank currency at the earliest moment practicable.—Tennessee State Democratic platform, 1876.

1878: The odious national banking act be repealed and greenbacks be substituted for the circulation of national banks. * * * That no more interest-bearing bonds be issued; that all loans required by the Government be raised by the issuance of noninterest-bearing Treasury notes.

TEXAS.

1878: We favor one currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the officeholder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder. * * * The substitution of United States legal tender for national-bank notes and its permanent reestablishment as the sole paper money of the country.

No further increase in the bonded debt; no further sale of bonds for the purchase of coin for redemption purposes, but a gradual reduction of the public debt by payment according to the original contract by which it was created.

VERMONT.

1878: The honest payment of the public debt in such currency as its terms imply, and the preservation of the public faith.

One currency for all. We oppose the present national banking system and recommend the gradual substitution of greenbacks for national-bank bills.

WISCONSIN.

1887: Declares its opposition to a longer continuance of the national-bank currency and demands that the Government furnish its own notes in the place thereof.

UTTERANCES OF EMINENT STATESMEN.

These are the words of Mr. Jefferson:

"It is a wise rule and should be fundamental in a government disposed to cherish its credit, but at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, 'never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax on the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith.' On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a government may always command, on a reasonable interest, all the lendable money of their citizens, while the necessity of equivalent tax is a salutary warning to them and their constituents against oppression, bankruptcy, and its inevitable consequence, revolution. But the term of redemption must be moderate and at any rate within the limits of their rightful powers. But what limits, it will be asked, does this prescribe to their powers? What is to hinder them from creating a perpetual debt? The laws of nature, I answer. The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life, by nature's law."

* * * * * * *

"In seeking, then, for an ultimate term for the redemption of our debts, let us rally to this principle and provide for their payment within the term of nineteen years at the furthest." (Volume 6, pages 136, 137.)

"We must raise, then, ourselves the money for this war, either by taxes within the year, or by loans; and if by loans, we must repay them ourselves, proscribing forever the English practice of perpetual funding, the ruinous consequences of which, putting right out of the question, should be a sufficient warning to a considerate nation to avoid the example." (Volume 6, page 197.)

"At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about 'a public debt being a public blessing'; that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that size entered bona fide into it." (Volume 6, page 239.)

"The misfortune is that in the meantime we shall plunge ourselves in unextinguishable debt, and entail on our posterity an inheritance of eternal taxes, which will bring our Government and people into the condition of those of England, a nation of pikes and gudgeons, the latter bred merely as food for the former." (Volume 6, page 409.)

"Funding I consider as limited, rightfully, to a redemption of the debt within the lives of a majority of the generation contracting it; every generation coming equally, by the laws of the Creator of the world, to the free possession of the earth He made for their subsistence, unencumbered by their predecessors, who, like them, were but tenants for life."

* * * * * * *

"And I sincerely believe, with you, that banking establishments are more dangerous than standing armies; and that the principle of spending money to be paid by posterity, under the name of funding, is but swindling futurity on a large scale." (Volume 6, pages 605–608.)

"No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce, to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness as that, laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together." (Volume 7, page 7.)

* * * * * * *

"I am not among those who fear the people. They and not the rich are our dependence for continued freedom. And to preserve their independence we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our election between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude. If we run into such debts as that we must be taxed in our meat and in our drink, in our necessaries and our comforts, in our labors and our amusements, for our callings and our creeds, as the people of England are; our people, like them, must come to labor sixteen hours in the twenty-four, give the earnings of fifteen of these to the Government for their debts and daily expenses; and the sixteenth being insufficient to afford us bread, we must live, as they now do, on oatmeal and potatoes; have no time to think, no means of calling the mismanagers to account, but be glad to obtain subsistence by hiring ourselves to rivet their chains on the necks of our fellow-sufferers. Our landholders, too, like theirs, retaining indeed the title and stewardship of estates called theirs, but held in trust for the Treasury, must wander, like theirs, in foreign countries, and be contented with penury, obscurity, exile, and the glory of the nation. This example reads to us the salutary lesson that private fortunes are destroyed by public as well as by private extravagance. And this is the tendency of all known governments. A departure from principle in one instance becomes a precedent for a second, that second for a third, and so on till the bulk of the society is reduced to be mere automatons of misery, to have no sensibilities left but for sinning and suffering. Then begins, indeed, the bellum omnium in omnia, which some philosophers, observing to be so general in this world, have mistaken it for the natural instead of the abusive state of man. And the forehorse of this frightful team is public debt. Taxation follows that, and in its turn wretchedness and oppression." (Volume 7, page 14.)

* * * * * * *

"I place economy among the first and most important of republican virtues, and public debt as the greatest of the dangers to be feared. We see in England the consequences of the want of it—their laborers reduced to live on a penny in the shilling of their earnings, to give up bread, and resort to oatmeal and potatoes for food; and their landholders exiling themselves to live in penury and obscurity abroad, because at home the Government must have all the clear profits of their land. In fact, they see the fee simple of the island transferred to the public creditors, all its profits going to them for the interest of their debts. Our laborers and landholders must come to this also unless they serenely adhere to the economy you recommend." (Volume 7, page 19.)

"The incorporation of a bank and the powers assumed by this bill have not, in my opinion, been delegated to the United States by the Constitution."—Opinion against the constitutionality of a national bank, February 15, 1791, volume 7, page 556.

"The bank filled and overflowed in the moment it was opened. Instead of 20,000 shares 24,000 were offered and a great many unpresented who had not suspected that so much haste was necessary. Thus it is that we shall be paying 13 per cent per annum for eight millions of paper money, instead of having that circulation of gold and silver for nothing. Experience has proved to us that a dollar of silver disappears for every dollar of paper emitted; and for the paper emitted from the bank 7 per cent profits will be received by the subscribers for it as bank paper (according to the last division of profits by the Philadelphia Bank), and 6 per cent on the public paper of which it is the representative."—Letter to Colonel Monroe, July 10, 1791, volume 3, page 268.

"Our public credit is good, but the abundance of paper has produced a spirit of gambling in the funds, which has laid up our ships at the wharves as too slow instruments of profit, and has even disarmed the hand of the tailor of his needle and thimble. They say the evil will cure itself. I wish it may, but I have rarely seen a gamester cured, even by the disasters of his vocation."—Letter to Gouverneur Morris, August 30, 1791, volume 3, page 290.

"You will see further that we are completely saddled and bridled, and that the bank is so firmly mounted on us that we must go where they will guide. They openly publish a resolution that, the national property being increased in value, they must by an increase of circulating medium furnish an adequate representation of it, and by further additions of active capital promote the enterprises of our merchants."—Letter to Colonel Monroe, June 12, 1796, volume 4, page 140.

"I wish it were possible to obtain a single amendment to our Constitution. I would be willing to depend on that alone for the reduction of the administration of our Government to the genuine principles of its Constitution; I mean an additional article, taking from the Federal Government the power of borrowing. I now deny their power of making paper money or anything else a legal tender."—Letter to John Taylor, November 26, 1798, volume 4, page 260.

"The monopoly of a single bank is certainly an evil. The multiplication of them was intended to cure it; but it multiplied an influence of the same character with the first, and completed the supplanting the precious metals by a paper circulation."—Letter to Mr. Gallatin, June 19, 1802, volume 4, page 440.

"From a passage in the letter of the president [of the United States Bank] I observe an idea of establishing a branch bank of the United States in New Orleans. This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our Constitution. The nation is at this time so strong and united in its sentiments that it can not be shaken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a republican government to meet a crisis of great danger or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries, an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command and in phalanx, may in a critical moment upset the Government."—Letter to Mr. Gallatin, December 13, 1803, volume 4, page 519.

"That we are overdone with banking institutions, which have banished the precious metals and substituted a more fluctuating and unsafe medium; that these have withdrawn capital from useful improvements and employments to nourish idleness; that the wars of the world have swollen our commerce beyond the wholesome limits of exchanging our own productions for our own wants, and that, for the emolument of a small proportion of our society, who prefer these demoralizing pursuits to labors useful to the whole, the peace of the whole is endangered, and all our present difficulties produced, more easily to be deplored than remedied."—Letter to Abbe Salimankis, March 14, 1810, volume 5, page 516.

"One of the great advantages of specie as a medium is that, being of universal value, it will keep itself at a general level, flowing out from where it is too high into parts where it is lower. Whereas, if the medium be of local value only, as paper money, if too little, indeed, gold and silver will flow in to supply the deficiency; but if too much, it accumulates, banishes the gold and silver not locked up in vaults and hoards, and depreciates itself—that is to say, its proportion to the annual produce of industry being raised, more of it is required to represent any particular article of produce than in the other countries. And to fill up the measure of blessing, instead of paying, they receive an interest on what they owe from those to whom they owe; for all the notes, or evidences of what they owe, which we see in circulation, have been lent to somebody on an interest which is levied again on us through the medium of commerce."—Letter to John W. Eppes, November 6, 1813, volume 6, page 239.

"Everything predicted by the enemies of banks in the beginning is now coming to pass. We are to be ruined now by the deluge of bank paper, as we were formerly by the old Continental paper. It is cruel that such revolutions in private fortunes should be at the mercy of avaricious adventurers, who instead of employing their capital, if any they have, in manufactures, commerce, or other useful pursuits, make it an instrument to burden all the interchanges of property with their swindling profits, profits which are the price of no useful industry of theirs. * * * I am an enemy to all banks discounting bills or notes for anything but coin."—Letter to Dr. Thomas Cooper, January 16, 1814, volume 6, page 295.

"Until the gigantic banking propositions of this winter had made their appearance in the different legislatures, I had hoped that the evil might still be checked; but I see now that it is desperate, and that we must fold our arms and go to the bottom with the ship."—Letter to Joseph C. Cabell, esq., January 17, 1814, volume 6, page 300.

"I have ever been the enemy of banks, not of those discounting for cash, but of those foisting their own paper into circulation, and thus banishing our cash. My zeal against those institutions was so warm and open at the establishment of the Bank of the United States that I was derided as a maniac by the tribe of bank mongers who were seeking to filch from the public their swindling and barren gains."—Letter to President Adams, January 24, 1814, volume 6, page 305.

"From the establishment of the United States Bank to this day I have preached against this system, but have been sensible no cure could be hoped but in the catastrophe now happening. The remedy was to let banks drop gradation at the expiration of their charters, and for the State governments to relinquish the power of establishing others. This would not, as it should not, have given the power of establishing them to Congress. But Congress could then have issued Treasury notes payable within a fixed period, and founded on a specific tax, the proceeds of which, as they came in, should be exchangeable for the notes of that particular emission only."—Letter to Thomas Cooper, esq., September 10, 1814, volume 6, page 381.

"Let us be allured by no objects of banks, public or private, or ephemeral expedients, which, enabling us to gasp and flounder a little longer, only increase by protracting the agonies of death."—Letter to James Monroe, October 16, 1814, volume 6, page 395.

"The fatal possession of the whole circulating medium by our banks, the excess of those institutions, and their present discredit cause all our difficulties. Treasury notes of small as well as high denomination, bottomed on a tax which would redeem them in ten years, would place at our disposal the whole circulating medium of the United States; a fund of credit sufficient to carry us through any probable length of war."—Letter to his excellency Mr. Crawford, February 11, 1815, volume 6, page 419.

"The Government is now issuing Treasury notes for circulation, bottomed on solid funds, and bearing interest. The banking confederacy (and the merchants bound to them by their debts) will endeavor to crush the credit of these notes, but the country is eager for them, as something they can trust to, and so soon as a convenient quantity of them can get into circulation, the bank notes die."—Letter to Jean Batiste Say, March 2, 1815, volume 6, page 434.

"Their merchants (the English) established among us, the bonds by which our own are chained to their feet, and the banking combinations interwoven with the whole, have shown the extent of their control, even during a war with her. They are the workers of all the embarrassments our finances have experienced during the war."—Letter to Cæsar A. Rodney, March 16, 1815, volume 6, page 449.

"Like a dropsical man calling out for water, water, our deluded citizens are clamoring for more banks, more banks. The American mind is now in the state of fever which the world has so often seen in the history of other nations. We are under the bank bubble, as England was under the South Sea bubble, France under the Mississippi bubble, and as every nation is liable to be under whatever bubble, design, or delusion may puff up in moments when off their guard. We are now taught to believe that legerdemain tricks upon paper can produce as solid wealth as hard labor in the earth. It is vain for common sense to urge that nothing can produce nothing; that it is an idle dream to believe in a philosopher's stone which is to turn everything into gold, and to redeem man from the original sentence of his Maker, 'In the sweat of his brow shall he eat his bread.'"—Letter to Colonel Yancey, January 6, 1816, volume 6, page 515.

"The metallic medium of which we should be possessed at the commencement of a war would be a sufficient fund for all the loans we should need through its continuance; and if the national bills issued be bottomed (as is indispensible) on pledges of specific taxes for their redemption within certain and moderate epochs, and be of proper denominations for circulation, no interest on them would be necessary or just, because they would answer to everyone the purposes of the metallic money withdrawn and replaced by them."—Letter to William H. Crawford, June 20, 1816, volume 7, page 8.

"The bank mania is one of the most threatening of these imitations. It is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the Government at defiance, and although forced at length to yield a little on this first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. These have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerberus from fable has become history. Their principles lay hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those whom the Constitution had placed as guards to its portals are sophisticated or suborned from their duties. That paper money has some advantages is admitted. But that its abuses also are inevitable, and by breaking up the measure of value makes a lottery of all private property, can not be denied. Shall we ever be able to put a constitutional veto upon it?"—Letter to Dr. Josephus B. Stuart, May 10, 1817, volume 7, page 64.

"There is, indeed, one evil which awakens me at times, because it jostles me at every turn. It is that we have now no measure of value."—Letter to Nathaniel Macon, esq., January 12, 1819, volume 7, page 111.

"The evils of this deluge of paper money are not to be removed until our citizens are generally and radically instructed in their cause and consequences, and silence by their authority the interested clamors and sophistry of speculating, shaving, and banking institutions."—Letter to Mr. Adams, March 21, 1819, volume 7, page 115.

"The paper bubble is then burst. This is what you and I and every reasonable man, seduced by no obliquity of mind or interest, have long foreseen, yet its disastrous effects are not the less for having been foreseen. We are laboring under a dropsical fullness of circulating medium. Nearly all of it is now called in by the banks, who have the regulation of the safety valves of our fortunes, and who condense and explode them at their will. Lands in this State can not now be sold for a year's rent."—Letter to J. Adams, esq., November 7, 1819, volume 7, page 142.

"If we suffer the moral of the present lesson to pass away without improvement by the eternal suppression of bank paper, then, indeed, is the condition of our country desperate, until the slow advance of public instruction shall give to our functionaries the wisdom of their station."—Letter to Mr. Rives, November 28, 1819, volume 7, page 145.

"The plethory of circulating medium which raised the prices of everything to several times their ordinary and standard value, in which state of things many and heavy debts were contracted, and the sudden withdrawing too great a proportion of that medium, and reduction of prices far below that standard, constitute the disease under which we are now laboring and which must end in a general revolution of property if some remedy is not applied."—Letter to Mr. Rives, November 28, 1819, volume 7, page 146.

"Interdict forever, to both the State and National Governments, the power of establishing any paper bank, for without this interdiction we shall have the same ebbs and flows of medium and the same revolutions of property to go through every twenty or thirty years."—Letter to Mr. Rives, November 28, 1819, volume 7, page 147.

"The State is in a condition of unparalleled distress. The sudden reduction of the circulating medium from a plethory to all but annihilation is producing an entire revolution of fortune."—Letter to H. Nelson, esq., March 12, 1820, volume 7, page 151.

"I should put down all banks, admit none but a metallic circulation, that will take its proper level with the like circulation in other countries, and then our manufacturers may work in fair competition with those of other countries, and the import duties which the Government may lay for the purposes of revenue will so far place them above equal competition."—Letter to Mr. Pinckney, September 30, 1820, volume 7, page 180.

The expansion of the currency by the issue of paper in a period of prosperity will inevitably be succeeded by its contraction in periods of adversity.—W. H. Crawford.

The great object now in view is to terminate forever the evil of the present system, and to place the currency on a foundation so stable that it can not again be shaken. If a broad and sure foundation of gold and silver is provided for our system of paper credits we need not hereafter apprehend those alternate seasons of abundance and scarcity of money suddenly succeeding each other, which have so far marked our history and irreparably injured so many of our citizens.—Report of R. B. Taney, Secretary of Treasury, April 15, 1834.

Proneness to excessive issues has ever been the vice of the banking system, a vice as prominent in national as in State institutions. This propensity is as subservient to the advancement of private interests in the one as in the other; and those who direct them both, being principally guided by the same views and influenced by the same motives, will be equally ready to stimulate to extravagance of enterprise by improvidence of credit.—President Van Buren's message, September 4, 1837.

The history of trade in the United States for the last three or four years affords the most convincing evidence that our present condition is chiefly to be attributed to overaction in all the departments of business, an overaction deriving, perhaps, its first impulse from antecedent causes, but stimulated to its destructive consequences by excessive issues of bank paper and by other facilities for the acquisition and enlargement of credit.—President Van Buren's message, September 4, 1837.

The limited influence of a national bank in averting derangement in the exchanges of the country, or in compelling the resumption of specie payments, is now not less apparent than its tendency to increase inordinate speculation by sudden expansions and contractions; its disposition to create panic and embarrassment for the promotion of its own designs; its interference with politics, and its far greater power for evil than for good, either in regard to the local institutions or the operations of a government itself. What was in these respects but apprehension or opinion when a national bank was first established now stands confirmed by humiliating experience. The scenes through which we have passed conclusively prove how little our commerce, agriculture, manufactures, or finances require such an institution, and what dangers are attendant on its power—a power, I trust, never to be conferred by the American people upon their Government, and still less upon individuals not responsible to them for its unavoidable abuses.—President Van Buren's second annual message, December 4, 1838.

The experiment has been tried and local paper has failed as a national currency, and out of that failure arose the second United States bank. It will fail again and again, and forever. There is no safety for the Federal revenues but in the total exclusion of local paper, and that from every branch of the revenues—customs, lands, and post-office. There is no safety for the national finances but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver. After forty years' wandering in the wilderness of paper money we have approached the confines of the constitutional medium.—Benton, December 14, 1836.

The evils of a redundant paper circulation are now manifest to every eye. It alternately raises and sinks the value of every man's property. It makes a beggar of the man to-morrow who is indulging in dreams of wealth to-day. It converts the business of society into a mere lottery, while those who distribute the prizes are wholly irresponsible to the people. When the collapse comes, as come it must, it casts laborers out of employment, crushes manufacturers and merchants, and ruins thousands of honest and industrious citizens. Shall we then, by our policy, any longer contribute to such fatal results? That is the question.—Buchanan, September 29, 1837.

For myself, I am opposed to investing in banks the power of manufacturing a paper currency. This power of creating a currency for a nation is one of the highest and most important attributes of a sovereign power, and more deeply affects all the diversified interests of society than the exercise of any other power whatever. It is more important than coining money, for that must be preceded by the purchase of the bullion; but here is a power to manufacture paper money at pleasure, to constitute the currency of a State or nation, a power intrusted to the irresponsible directory of a bank, acting in secret, and whose chief interest is to abuse their power. In proportion as a bank increases in currency are its dividends and profits augmented, and hence the stimulus to overissues is irresistible, and especially is this the case where, as we have seen by the evidence before quoted, the very directors which manufacture the paper loan out, as a general rule, more than one-fourth of it to themselves. This power, then, of issuing their paper as money is truly fearful, and when united with the power of loaning at pleasure, in secret conclave, and to whom and for what purpose the bank directory may think proper, and of recalling it at pleasure, and of contracting and expanding as suits their caprice, is a power which few European despots would dare to exercise, and is utterly incompatible with the fundamental principles of a free government.—From the speech of Robert J. Walker in the Senate January 21, 1840.

Allow me, moreover, to hope that it will be a favorite policy with you not merely to secure a payment of the interest of the debt funded, but as far and as fast as the growing resources of the country will permit to exonerate it of the principal itself. The appropriations you have made of the Western lands explain your disposition on this subject, and I am persuaded that the sooner that valuable fund can be made to contribute, along with other means, to the actual reduction of the public debt, the more salutary will the measure be to every public interest, as well as the more satisfactory to our constituents.—Washington's second annual address to Congress, December 8, 1790. (Williams's Presidents' Messages, volume 1, page 38.)

No pecuniary consideration is more urgent than the regular redemption and discharge of the public debt. On none can delay be more injurious or an economy of time be more valuable.—Washington's fifth annual address to Congress, December 3, 1793. (Williams's Presidents' Messages, volume 1, page 49.)

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: The time which has elapsed since the commencement of our fiscal measures has developed our pecuniary resources so as to open the way for a definitive plan for the redemption of the public debt. It is believed that the result is such as to encourage Congress to consummate this work without delay. Nothing can more promote the permanent welfare of the nation and nothing would be more grateful to our constituents. Indeed, whatever is unfinished of our system of public credit can not be benefited by procrastination; and as far as may be practicable we ought to place that credit on grounds which can not be disturbed and to prevent that progressive accumulation of debt which must ultimately endanger all governments.—Washington's sixth annual address to Congress, November 19, 1794. (Williams's Presidents' Messages, volume 1, page 59.)

The consequences arising from the continual accumulation of public debts in other countries ought to admonish us to be careful to prevent their growth in our own. The national defense must be provided for as well as the support of Government, but both should be accomplished as much as possible by immediate taxes and as little as possible by loans.—President John Adams's message, 1797.

When effects so salutary result from the plan you have already sanctioned, when merely by avoiding false objects of expense we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing, to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that moral canker, it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order, to proceed as we have begun, in substituting economy for taxation, and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practiced by others under different circumstances. And whensoever we are destined to meet events which shall call forth all the energies of our countrymen, we have the firmest reliance on those energies, and the comfort of leaving for calls like these the extraordinary resources of loans and internal taxes.—Jefferson's second annual message to Congress, December 15, 1802. (Williams's Presidents' Messages, volume 1, page 160.)

I am uneasy at seeing that the sale of our western lands is not yet commenced. That valuable fund for the immediate extinction of our debt will, I fear, be suffered to slip through our fingers. Every delay exposes it to events which no human foresight can guard against.—Letter to James Madison, June 20, 1787, volume 2, page 153.

The question whether one generation of men has a right to bind another seems never to have been started either on this or our side of the water. Yet it is a question of such consequences as not only to merit decision, but place also among the fundamental principles of every government. The course of reflection in which we are immersed here, on the elementary principles of society, has presented this question to my mind; and that no such obligation can be transmitted I think very capable of proof. I set out on this ground, which I suppose to be self-evident, that the earth belongs in usufruct to the living; that the dead have neither powers nor rights over it. The portion occupied by any individual ceases to be his when himself ceases to be, and reverts to the society. If the society has formed no rules for the appropriation of its lands in severalty, it will be taken by the first occupants, and these will generally be the wife and children of the decedent. If they have formed rules of appropriation, those rules may give it to the wife and children, or to some one of them, or to the legatee of the deceased. So they may give it to its creditor. But the child, the legatee, or creditor takes it not by natural right, but by a law of the society of which he is a member and to which he is subject. Then, no man can, by natural right, oblige the lands he occupied, or the persons who succeed him in that occupation, to the payment of debts contracted by him. For if he could he might during his own life eat up the usufruct of the lands for several generations to come; and then the lands would belong to the dead and not to the living, which is the reverse of our principle.

What is true of every member of the society individually is true of them all collectively, since the rights of the whole can be no more than the sum of the rights of the individuals. To keep our ideas clear when applying them to a multitude, let us suppose a whole generation of men to be born on the same day, to attain mature age on the same day, and to die on the same day, leaving a succeeding generation in the moment of attaining their mature age, all together. Let the ripe age be supposed of 21 years, and their period of life thirty-four years more, that being the average term given by the bills of mortality to persons of 21 years of age. Each successive generation would, in this way, come and go off the stage at a fixed moment, as individuals do now. Then, I say, the earth belongs to each of these generations during its course, fully and in its own right. The second generation receives it clear of the debts and incumbrances of the first, the third of the second, and so on. For if the first could charge it with a debt, then the earth would belong to the dead and not to the living generation. Then no generation can contract debts greater than may be paid during the course of its own existence.—Letter written from Paris to James Madison, September 6, 1789, volume 3, page 103.

Not those who promote unnecessary accumulations of the debt of the Union, instead of the best means of discharging it as fast as possible, thereby increasing the causes of corruption in the Government and the pretext for new taxes under its authority, the former undermining the confidence, the latter alienating the affections of the people.

The real friends of the Union are those who are friends to the authority of the people, the sole foundation on which the Union rests;

Who are friends to liberty, the great end for which the Union was formed;

Who are friends to the limited and republican system of government, the means provided by that authority for the attainment of that end;

Who, considering a public debt as injurious to the interests of the people and baneful to the virtue of the Government, are enemies to every contrivance for unnecessarily increasing its amount, or protracting its duration, or extending its influence.

In a word, those are the real friends of the Union who are friends to that republican policy throughout which is the only cement for the union of a republican people, in opposition to a spirit of usurpation and monarchy, which is the menstruum most capable of dissolving it.—No. 15, Writings of Madison, March 31, 1792, page 480.

If Providence permits me to meet you at another session, I shall have the high gratification of announcing to you that the national debt is extinguished. I can not refrain from expressing the pleasure I feel at the near approach of that desirable event. The short period of time within which the public debt will have been discharged is strong evidence of the abundant resources of the country and of the prudence and economy with which the Government has heretofore been administered.—President Jackson's message, 1833.

I can not too cordially congratulate Congress and my fellow-citizens on the near approach of that memorable and happy event, the extinction of the public debt of this great and free nation. Faithful to the wise and patriotic policy marked out by the legislation of the country for this object, the present Administration has devoted to it all the means which its flourishing commerce has supplied and a prudent economy preserved for the Public Treasury. Within the four years for which the people have confided the executive power to my charge, $58,000,000 will have been applied to the payment of the public debt.

* * * * * * *

The final removal of this great burden from our resources affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defense which the Constitution authorizes and prevents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them.—President Jackson's annual message, 1833.

The paper-money system and its natural associates, monopoly and exclusive privileges, have already struck their roots deep in the soil; and it will require all your efforts to check its further growth and to eradicate the evil. The men who profit by the abuses and desire to perpetuate them will continue to besiege the halls of legislation in the General Government as well as in the States, and will seek, by every artifice, to mislead and deceive the public servants. It is to yourselves that you must look for safety and the means of guarding and perpetuating your free institutions. In your hands is rightfully placed the sovereignty of the country, and to you everyone placed in authority is ultimately responsible. It is always in your power to see that the wishes of the people are carried into faithful execution, and their will, when once made known, must sooner or later be obeyed. And while the people remain, as I trust they ever will, uncorrupted and incorruptible, and continue watchful and jealous of their rights, the Government is safe, and the cause of freedom will continue to triumph over its enemies.

But it will require steady and persevering exertions on your part to rid yourself of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform on this subject that you must not hope the conflict will be a short one nor success easy. My humble efforts have not been spared, during my administration of the Government, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done toward the accomplishment of this most desirable object. But enough yet remains to require all your energy and perseverance. The power, however, is in your hands, and the remedy must and will be applied if you determine upon it.—Jackson's Farewell Address.

The creation, in time of peace, of a debt likely to become permanent is an evil for which there is no equivalent. The rapidity with which many of the States are apparently approaching to this condition admonishes us of our own duties in a manner too impressive to be disregarded. One, not the least important, is to keep the Federal Government always in a condition to discharge with ease and vigor its highest functions, should their exercise be required by any sudden conjuncture of public affairs—a condition to which we are always exposed, and which may occur when least expected. To this end it is indispensable that its finances should be untrammeled and its resources, so far as practicable, unencumbered. No circumstance should present greater obstacles to the accomplishment of these vitally important objects than the creation of an onerous national debt. Our own experience, and also that of other nations, has demonstrated the unavoidable and fearful rapidity with which a public debt is increased when the Government has once surrendered itself to the ruinous practice of supplying its supposed necessities by new loans. The struggle, therefore, on our part, to be successful, must be made at the threshold. To make our efforts effective, severe economy is necessary. This is the surest provision for the national welfare, and it is at the same time the best preservative of the principles on which our institutions rest. Simplicity and economy in the affairs of state have never failed to chasten and invigorate republican principles, while these have been as surely subverted by national prodigality under whatever specious pretext it may have been introduced or fostered.—Van Buren's third annual message. (Statesman's Manual, volume 2, page 1121.)

A few years ago our whole national debt growing out of the Revolution and the war of 1812 with Great Britain was extinguished, and we presented to the world the rare and noble spectacle of a great and growing people who had fully discharged every obligation. Since that time the existing debt has been contracted; and, small as it is in comparison with the similar burdens of most other nations, it should be extinguished at the earliest practicable period. Should the state of the country permit, and especially if our foreign relations interpose no obstacle, it is contemplated to apply all the moneys in the Treasury, as they accrue beyond what is required for the appropriations by Congress, to its liquidation. I cherish the hope of soon being able to congratulate the country on its recovering once more the lofty position which it so recently occupied. Our country, which exhibits to the world the benefits of self-government in developing all the sources of national prosperity, owes to mankind the permanent example of a nation free from the blighting influence of a public debt.—Polk's first annual message, December 2, 1845. (Statesman's Manual, volume 4, page 1462.)

The amount of the public debt to be contracted should be limited to the lowest practicable sum, and should be extinguished as early after the conclusion of the war as the means of the Treasury will permit.

With this view it is recommended that as soon as the war shall be over all the surplus in the Treasury, not needed for other indispensable objects, shall constitute a sinking fund and be applied to the purchase of the funded debt, and that authority be conferred by law for that purpose.—Polk's third annual message, December 7, 1847. (Statesman's Manual, volume 4, page 1704.)

Besides making the necessary legislative provisions for the execution of the treaty, and the establishment of Territorial governments in the ceded country, we have, upon the restoration of peace, other important duties to perform. Among these I regard none as more important than the adoption of proper measures for the speedy extinguishment of the national debt. It is against sound policy and the genius of our institutions that a public debt should be permitted a day longer than the means of the Treasury will enable the Government to pay it off. We should adhere to the wise policy laid down by President Washington, of "avoiding the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden we ourselves ought to bear."—Polk's special message, July 6, 1848. (Statesman's Manual, volume 4, page 1743.)

In my message of the 6th of July last, transmitting to Congress the ratified treaty of peace with Mexico, I recommended the adoption of measures for the speedy payment of the public debt. In reiterating that recommendation, I refer you to the considerations presented in that message in its support.

* * * * * * *

The public expenditures should be economical and be confined to such necessary objects as are clearly within the powers of Congress. All such as are not absolutely demanded should be postponed and the payment of the public debt at the earliest practicable period should be a cardinal principle of our public policy.—Polk's fourth annual message, December 5. (Statesman's Manual, volume 4, page 1774.)

The following are from Clay, Calhoun, Crawford, and Benton:

Mr. Clay said, in 1816, he would—

"Lay down a general rule, from which there ought never to be a departure without absolute necessity, that the expense of the year ought to be met by the revenue of the year. If in time of war it were impossible to observe this rule we ought in time of peace to provide for as speedy a discharge of the debt contracted in the preceding war as possible."

And in 1824 he said:

"The payment of that debt and the consequent liberation of the public resources from the charge of it is extremely desirable.

"The moral value of the payment of a national debt consists in the demonstration which it affords of the ability of a country to meet and its integrity in fulfilling all its engagements. * * * Whoever may be entitled to the credit of the payment of the public debt, I congratulate you, sir, and the country most cordially that it is so near at hand."

I shall oppose strenuously all attempts to originate a new debt; to create a national bank; to reunite the political and money power—more dangerous than that of church and state—in any form or shape.—Calhoun on the bill for the issue of Treasury notes, United States Senate, September 18, 1837. (Abridgment Debates in Congress, volume 13, page 363.)

An attentive examination of the rise and fall of public debts in other countries can not fail to impress the American Republic with the necessity of making suitable exertions in periods of peace to release the national revenue from so heavy an incumbrance.—W. H. Crawford, December 16, 1816.

What more unwise and more unjust than to contract debts on long time, as some of the States have done, thereby invading the rights and mortgaging the resources of posterity, and loading unborn generations with debts not their own? What more unwise than all this, which several of the States have done, and which the effort now is to make all do? Besides the ultimate burden, in the shape of final payment, which is intended to fall upon posterity, the present burden is incessant in the shape of annual interest, and, falling upon each generation, equals the principal in every periodical return of ten or a dozen years. Few have calculated the devouring effect of annual interest on public debts and considered how soon it exceeds the principal.—Benton's speech on assumption of State debts; Thirty Years' View, volume 2, page 173.

The following are the declarations of the national Democracy in their platforms:

"A rigorously, frugal administration of the Government and the application of all the possible savings of the public revenue to the liquidation of the public debt, and resistance, therefore, to all measures looking to the multiplication of officers and salaries merely to create indebtedness and augment the public debt on the principle of its being a public blessing."—Platform of 1800 article 4.

"We declare unqualified hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver is the only safe and constitutional currency."—Platform, 1836.

"ART. 6. That Congress has no power to charter a United States bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and will of the people."—Democratic platform, 1840.

Democratic platform of 1844 affirms article 6 of the platform of 1840.

Democratic platform of 1848 declares—

"For the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt."

The platform of 1848 further declares that the triumph of 1844 had fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union in defeating the declared purposes of their opponents to create a national bank. In protecting the currency and labor of the country from ruinous fluctuations and guarding the money of the country for the use of the people by the establishment of a constitutional Treasury.

Also—

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt."—Democratic platform, 1852, article 8.

Article 9 of the same:

"That Congress has no power to charter a national bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power above the laws and will of the people."—Democratic platform, 1852, article 9.

That Congress has no power to charter a national bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the American people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and will of the people.—Democratic platform, 1856, article 7.

Payment of all the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable.—Democratic platform, 1868, article 3.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, according to the unanimous agreement of the Senate this afternoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m., Friday, January 31) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 1, 1896, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I ask consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act of 1893, authorizing the St. Lawrence Railway Company, of the State of New York, to build and maintain a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at some point in St. Lawrence County, State of New York, be, and is hereby, amended by extending the time for the completion of said bridge to

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The following amendments, reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, were read and agreed to:

After the word "act," in line 3, strike out the word "of" and insert "approved February ninth."

After the word "to," in line 8, add the words "February ninth, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ACCOMMODATIONS FOR CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent to report favorably a joint resolution from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for which I desire immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896" was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant to the committee known as "The Committee of 1896," of which W. H. H. Smith is chairman, having charge in the city of Washington, D. C., of the arrangements for the Fifteenth International Christian Endeavor Convention, permits for the temporary occupation and use, during July, 1896, of the reservation or public space known as the White Lot for the purpose of erecting three or more great tents and the necessary platforms, seatings, etc., capable of seating about 10,000 persons each, for the meeting places of the Fifteenth International Christian Endeavor Convention, to be held July 8 to 13, inclusive, 1896, and such smaller tents as may be required for the distribution of literature, etc., together with such portions of the Monument Grounds as said committee may require, if in his opinion such use will inflict no serious or permanent injury upon such grounds, reservation, or public space: Provided, That said "Committee of 1896" guarantee, at their own cost and expense, to restore and make good any temporary injury that may be inflicted to said grounds by reason of their use thereof.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The following amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to:

In line 11, after the word "three," strike out the words "or more"; so as to read "for the purpose of erecting three tents," etc.

After the word "seatings," in line 12, and after the word "literature," in line 17, strike out the words "and so forth."

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORSE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CESSION OF LAND TO OHIO.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that a joint resolution of the Ohio legislature be read and printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

House joint resolution No. 12.

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence in securing the passage of an act ceding certain lands to the State of Ohio.

Whereas the Ohio canal commission, in the prosecution of its work of investigating the titles of State lands, finds that section 7, town 6, south range 4 east, Auglaize County, Ohio, is the property of the United States; and

Whereas said section 7 is wholly within the limits of the Mercer County reservoir and therefore a part of the public works of Ohio, and any disposition of it to private parties or corporations would work great injustice to the public works of the State; and

Whereas the canal commission having made application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for a patent to the land in the said section 7 under the swamp-land act of 1850, and said application having been rejected and the application is now pending on an appeal before the Secretary of the Interior; Therefore

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their good offices in securing the passage of an act ceding the land in question to the State of Ohio, and that the governor be requested to forward to our Senators and Representatives of Ohio a certified copy of this resolution.

CHARLES H. BOSLER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Adopted January 29, 1896.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution just read will be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CONTESTED ELECTION—ROSENTHAL VS. CROWLEY.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to call up the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3, in the case of Rosenthal vs. Crowley, from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Texas. Before the resolutions reported by the committee are taken up for consideration, I wish to say that I am requested by Mr. Rosenthal to state that he thanks the House very warmly for the courtesy extended yesterday in granting him permission to address the House on his own behalf for one hour to-day, but that upon reflection and on consultation with his friends he has decided not to avail himself of the opportunity so kindly granted, and is willing that the resolutions reported from our committee should pursue their regular course.

While I am on the floor, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the same committee in the same case, upon the question of permitting Mr. Rosenthal to amend his notice of contest. I ask for the reading of the resolutions as reported yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to file an additional report in regard to the amendment of notice of contest?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir; a report on a resolution referred by the House to the committee, authorizing Mr. Rosenthal to amend his notice of contest. It is a matter entirely separate from the matter reported on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this report to which the gentleman now refers should be handed in later; it should not be a part of the present proceedings. The Clerk will report the resolutions reported yesterday, and which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] now calls up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That A. J. Rosenthal was not elected a Representative from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Texas to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Miles Crowley was duly elected a Representative from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Texas to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is entitled to the seat.

The question being taken, the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this courtesy has been accorded to that committee heretofore?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. In former Congresses it has been.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; and it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES W. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DUPLICATE ENGROSSED BILL.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to furnish a duplicate engrossed bill, S. 708, in lieu of the original, which has been lost.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

ADDITIONAL ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 105) for the relief of ex-Naval Cadets John P. J. Ryan, John R. Morris, and Chester Wells.

Be it resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint John P. J. Ryan, John R. Morris, and Chester Wells to be assistant engineers in the Navy: Provided, That they shall pass an examination in steam engineering that shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy: And provided further, That they shall take rank and receive pay only from the date of their appointment, and shall rank with each other in the order of merit as shown by the examination herein provided for.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, we ought to have some explanation of this.

Mr. HULL. I shall have to object to the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. CROWTHER. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection and permit me to say that this meets the approval of the Secretary of the Navy. In fact, I hold in my hand a letter suggesting that the resolution be adopted, for the reason that the maximum number of assistant engineers now in the Navy is 23 less than the law provides for.

The three young men mentioned in the resolution have been educated at the expense of the Government. They failed to pass a technical examination in steam engineering last June, and there can be no objection to the passage of the resolution, inasmuch as it is to the advantage of the service and meets the approval of gentlemen having these matters in charge.

Mr. TERRY. I think it ought to go to a committee.

Mr. HULL. While I concede that what the gentleman from Missouri has said may be all true, I insist that this must go to a committee, and I object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DISTILLATION OF BRANDY FROM PRUNES.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. I refer to the bill (H. R. 886) relating to the distillation of brandy from prunes, and amending section 3255 of the Revised Statutes, with amendments recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, or prunes from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is there a report from the committee accompanying this bill?

Mr. EVANS. There is.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report of the committee may be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred H. R. 886, report the same back to the House with the following amendments:

In line 9, after the word "grapes," insert the words "pears, pineapples, oranges, apricots, berries."

Amend the title so as to read "To amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits."

Section 3255 of the Revised Statutes gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the right to exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, or grapes from certain provisions of the law related to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon. This bill extends the provisions of section 3255 to brandy made from pears, pineapples, and berries. It does not affect the tax on such brandies.

The Committee on Ways and Means recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Is this reported from the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. EVANS. It is, unanimously; and has the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to hear the bill read as it is proposed to be amended.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be read as it will stand if amended.

The bill as proposed to be amended was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STEAMER MATTEAWAN.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk (H. R. 4698), to provide an American register for the steamer Matteawan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Asturian Prince, owned by Charles W. Hogan, a citizen of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of Matteawan.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the inspection of said vessel, steam boilers, steam pipes, and their appurtenances, and cause to be granted the usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine without reference to the fact that said steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests in the inspection of said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances shall be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. PAYNE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4698) providing an American register for the steamer Matteawan, have considered the same and report as follows:

The evidence filed with the committee shows that the Matteawan is a steel steamship, was built in 1893, and was wrecked on the east point of Curaçao, West Indies, on or about June 3, 1895, where she was abandoned by her crew and remained for four months, when she was, after six weeks' work, floated by the Merritt wrecking organization, of New York, and brought to New York, where she was sold as a wreck December 9, 1895, by the agent of the foreign underwriters to her present owner, Mr. Charles W. Hogan, of New York, a citizen of the United States, for the sum of $10,139.38. The Matteawan is now being repaired for Mr. Hogan by the John N. Robins Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the contract for said repairs shows that the cost of same to put the vessel in a first-class seaworthy condition will be $50,801.50, and the repairs will be completed by February 8, 1896.

In view of the fact that this vessel is eligible for registry under the general law (sec. 4136, Rev. Stat.) in all respects save that she was not wrecked within the waters of the United States, your committee believe that the spirit of the law will be observed by granting the register, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw this bill until these repairs are completed. This is something unusual. I shall have to object until the repairs are completed. It is only a matter of a couple of weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—ROSENTHAL VS. CROWLEY.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Elections No. 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] desires to make the report which he offered before, with regard to the case of Rosenthal vs. Crowley.

The report (by Mr. JENKINS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 3, to whom was referred the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the contestant, A. J. Rosenthal, be, and he is hereby, authorized to so amend his notice of contest in the case of A. J. Rosenthal vs. Miles Crowley, Tenth Congressional district, State of Texas, by adding thereto the following, to wit: That there were unlawfully counted in making up the returns from said district, divers precincts in Galveston County, in which no returns had been made according to law, viz, all of the precincts in said county, except Nos. 2, 3, 7, 7½, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 13½—

Respectfully submit the following report.

That inasmuch as in the unanimous report of the committee in the foregoing case this resolution has been considered as if filed, and inasmuch as no injustice can be done to the contestant by an adverse report, they respectfully recommend that the resolution do not pass.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to move that the resolution be laid on the table?

Mr. JENKINS. I do.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I think there will be no objection now to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROWTHER] offered a resolution this morning, to which there was objection. The Chair understands the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] to now withdraw his objection?

Mr. TERRY. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before consent is given, I should like to ask to hear a statement with reference to this.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Missouri will be recognized to make an explanation.

Mr. CROWTHER. This resolution refers to the appointment of three ex-naval cadets as assistant engineers in the United States Navy. They graduated from the Academy last June. They have diplomas stating that they have passed satisfactory examinations, and they would have been appointed to a line office, that of ensign, had there been sufficient vacancies. Each one of the cadets was several points short of passing the examination in steam engineering, and as a result they failed to be appointed as assistant engineers. There are twenty-three vacancies in the positions of steam engineers, or twenty-three less than the law provides for. This question has been submitted to the Secretary of the Navy, whose letter I hold in my hand, in which he suggests a change in the resolution, which has been made, and he states with that amendment it meets with his approval, and he suggests that the resolution do pass. I will send the letter to the Clerk's desk to be read if any member desires it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to ask if this has been considered by the House Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CROWTHER. I have seen all the members of the Naval Committee who are present, and there has been no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply desire to say that I think it ought to be an extraordinary condition of things that would allow us to pass any bill here of this or any other character without first having it referred to a committee of this House for examination. We legislate largely through standing committees, and we ought not to violate the rule unless there is some special necessity for it. Ordinarily, every matter should have the consideration of a standing committee before it is brought before the House; but with the statement that the members of the committee have examined it and find no objection to it, I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask what committee reported this resolution?

The SPEAKER. No committee has reported it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has it been before any committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not; the gentleman from Missouri says that it has the approval of the Secretary and the individual members of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CROWTHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURTS FOR NORTHERN DIVISION OF EASTERN DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on House bill No. 1676, and ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1676) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee.

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Knoxville, Tenn., shall commence on the first Mondays in March and September of each year, instead of the second Mondays in January and July, as is now provided by law; and each of said terms shall continue as long as the presiding judge may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That no action, suit, proceeding, information, indictment, recognizance, bail bond, or other process in either of said courts shall abate or be rendered invalid by reason of the change of time in the holding of the terms of said courts, but the same shall be deemed to be returnable to, pending, and triable at the terms herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That this act take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it; and that all laws and parts of laws conflicting with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Has it been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary favorably?

The SPEAKER. It has been reported from that committee. The Clerk will read the report if the gentleman desires.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. BROWN) was read, as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration House bill No. 1676, to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit court for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MEDICAL COLLEGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 2656) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia for the purpose of correcting the report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to go into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. PATTERSON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to ask for the reprint of the bill (H. R. 3837) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reprint will be ordered.

There was no objection.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this bill I shall take but a very few minutes. It is principally a story of figures, and they are summarized in the closing paragraphs of the report. I will present them briefly. The total amount recommended to be appropriated for the general expenses of the District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, in the bill submitted, exclusive of the water department, is $5,225,365.97. Of this sum the General Government is required to pay $2,612,682.98, and the District $2,265,991. The former amount is $2,655 less than the estimates submitted.

The amount appropriated for the general expenses of the District of Columbia for the current fiscal year, that is, of 1896, including $15,940 in the sundry civil and urgent deficiency acts, is $5,559,263.97, being $333,898 more than is recommended in the accompanying bill for 1897; and the whole amount recommended in the accompanying bill, including sums for the water department—on a basis that will be explained in a moment—is $343,422.86 less than was appropriated for the current fiscal year. Now, the amount recommended for the water department, the object of which is to develop the water revenues, is $192,594.42; and the amount appropriated for the water department for the current year is $202,119.28, being a reduction of nine thousand and some odd hundred dollars.

It is estimated that the water revenues for the fiscal year 1897 will amount to $307,000, but it is provided in the accompanying bill, as it was provided in the acts for the four preceding fiscal years, that any surplus of these revenues over the appropriations specifically made therefrom shall be applied to the work of extending the high-service system of water distribution, for which there is an appropriation in the bill. Now, this improvement, it is estimated by the engineer officers of the District, would cost, when completed, $600,000.

The surplus water revenues devoted to this object, on account of expenditures made and obligations incurred since the said authority was granted, amount at this time to $355,615.72.

The total general revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1897, it is estimated by the Commissioners, will amount, exclusive of any estimated surplus of the revenues of prior years, to $3,225,081.56, or a surplus of $547,538.58 after meeting the appropriations proposed by the accompanying bill, together with the obligations (estimated at $64,860) imposed upon the District by the act of March 2, 1889, establishing the National Zoological Park, and for one-half the expenses of the court of appeals and supreme court of the District. This surplus, to the extent of $300,000, will be applied, under the operation of section 3 of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1893 and a provision of the accompanying bill, to the satisfaction of the indebtedness of the District to the United States on account of the cost of the increased water supply of the city of Washington under acts approved July 15, 1882, and March 3, 1891, which of course relates to what is known as the Lydecker tunnel.

These figures, Mr. Chairman, present in a summary way the scope of this bill, so far as the Treasury is concerned, and so far as the necessities of the District are concerned, which, of course, are the two great matters to be considered in every appropriation bill.

The amount appropriated by this bill is less, you will notice, than the estimates, and less than many of the friends of public improvements in the city of Washington hoped it would be; but, after all, it is not so bad when compared with former bills, for, while it falls short of the estimates by some $300,000, it exceeds the bill making appropriations for the current year, as it went to the Senate in the last House, by some $26,000.

With these general remarks I am disposed, if there be no desire for further general debate, to suggest that we proceed at once to consider the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is there any new legislation in the bill; and if so, what?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's question whether there is any new legislation in the bill, I will say that it contains some provisions which are new in this respect, that they have not heretofore appeared, but we think that none of them are subject to a point of order. These provisions will come up for explanation in the course of the consideration of the bill by paragraphs; but perhaps I may as well explain some of them now. The first is a provision with reference to the markets. We have reduced the salaries of the two market masters $200 each, and have forbidden the collections which have been made heretofore from people coming in from the country for the purpose of marketing their products, collections made from them for cleaning the market place and the streets of the dirt resulting from the presence of their horses and from other causes in connection with the business done there.

These assessments have been made heretofore, or collected, without authority of law. I will not say just that, because there is an old law providing that persons so occupying the market place shall clean up after themselves, and as every man coming in to the market from the country does not bring a shovel with him and could not do it himself, the custom grew up of employing the laborers around the market to do the work and paying them for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to disturb the plan which the gentleman in charge of this bill has mapped out for its consideration, but the printed bill has only come into our hands this morning, and if he will kindly indicate now at what points the new legislation is to be found, it will enable members to look it over and be prepared to consider it when it comes up in the regular order.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, all these points are set out in the report submitted with the bill, and if each member will provide himself with a copy of the report it seems to me that he will get therefrom the information he desires more easily than I can give it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Does the report show what was added last evening?

Mr. GROUT. Yes; everything is embraced in the report. However, Mr. Chairman, as I have entered upon this market question I may as well complete it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw my request for an explanation.

Mr. GROUT. Well, let me complete this point now, in order to save time, and because unless I do so what I have already said will appear to be fragmentary. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that when a farmer came to market with his produce and did not want to stop to clean up after himself, when he got ready to leave the market place he would arrange with the laborers there to have the work done at slight cost. Now, it fell out that these collections from farmers amounted to some one hundred or two hundred dollars; in some instances, I believe, to between three hundred and four hundred dollars in one market, and there was no accounting for this money.

It was an unauthorized collection, really, the result of a private arrangement. The market masters made complaint that they had not only to give the laborers this money, but that they had also to pay the laborers from one to two hundred dollars a year out of their own compensation; so the committee thought they would take the market masters at their word, would reduce their salaries by the amount which they said they had had to pay, would transfer the payment of the rents to the collector of the District, and at the same time would prohibit any further collections of this character from people coming from the country to sell their products, and provide for paying the laborers out of the public funds for keeping the markets clean.

This is the first provision in the bill which may be said to be in some sense new legislation, although it does not contravene in any way existing law, while it does help, as we think, to a sensible and practical administration of the old law and in a better way than has heretofore prevailed.

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will refer to the report they will see these matters explained in detail. Every new provision which may be the subject of criticism will be found referred to in the report, and gentleman will, of course, have the opportunity to raise points of order upon any provision when it is reached.

Mr. DINGLEY. These matters are referred to in the report under the head of "Limitations"?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], I will call his attention to the provisions on page 15 of the bill. The provisos attached to the provisions in regard to gas lighting and electric lighting are the principal matters which may be considered to embrace new legislation, and upon which some question may be raised as to whether or not they are in contravention of the rule. I refer to the system of competitive biddings for the supply of the city with gas and electric lighting.

The other provisions are, I think, in the main, simply additions rendered necessary by changed conditions. For instance, there have been a number of new schoolhouses added to the school system; and under the head of "Schools" there will be found provisions for a number of additional teachers. There is also provision for an increase of the police force to the extent of 25 members. An increase of 125 was asked; but in the bill we give only 25 new policemen.

The chairman has referred to the provision reducing the salaries of the two market masters. From the information which we have been able to gain, including the statement made to us by the clerk of the committee, it would seem that when the offices of market masters were created they were required, in addition to the policing of the markets, to look after the cleaning in and about them. The testimony of one of these market masters showed that he had been paying something over $200 out of his annual salary to laborers for completing the cleaning.

The committee discovered on investigation that the persons who sell on the sidewalks around the market do not receive or pay for licenses, but they have been required to clean off the sidewalks after the market hours were over. It appeared from the testimony that the laborers and the market masters were in the habit of collecting from these people sums which were paid to the laborers in addition to the compensation fixed by law. It was thought wise in this connection to reduce the salaries of those market masters to $1,000 each and to increase the compensation of the laborers; and inasmuch as this system of collections from these people who sell upon the sidewalks is wholly without authority of law, and liable, as the committee thought, to be made a system of blackmailing, we have embraced in this bill a provision prohibiting the collection of anything in that way, so that there might not be levied upon and collected from these people by the market masters and laborers an indefinite sum without any regulation of law.

These, I believe, are the radical changes in this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] whether the provision beginning with the word "Provided," in line 13, page 16, is not new legislation of a very radical character, and whether a similar proviso beginning on line 14, page 17, is not subject to the same criticism.

Mr. BLUE. In reply to that inquiry, I will say that while this may be new legislation, I do not understand that it interferes with any existing law. According to my understanding, there is no law upon the subjects covered by these new provisions; so that, while they may be regarded as new legislation, they do not come within the prohibition of the rule, because they do not interfere with any existing law.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is existing law prohibiting any person from interfering with the surface of the streets of this city. No one can break up the pavements or dig trenches or ditches. Anything of that kind is forbidden by law.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman refer to the statute by which it is forbidden?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no question that it is against the law.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; let us see the provision.

Mr. HEPBURN. No man can trespass upon these streets——

Mr. NORTHWAY. This is not a trespass.

Mr. HEPBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, this is a trespass.

Mr. PITNEY. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the time for the discussion of points of order upon this bill has not yet arrived.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am simply stating my view.

The CHAIRMAN. The point that questions of order can not now be raised upon the bill is well taken, because the Committee of the Whole is now proceeding with the general debate.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was simply asking this question, as I undertood, with the gentleman's permission; but if he is sensitive about the matter I will not press it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] yield to me a moment?

Mr. BLUE. The time belongs to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GROUT. I said a few moments ago that I was ready to submit this matter without further debate, but I find it can not be done so quickly as I had hoped.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that it would contribute very much to the orderly consideration of this bill if these several propositions be debated when they are reached in their order? I presume the gentleman in charge of the bill will be disposed to give ample time for the consideration and discussion of each item.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly; I have so expressed myself. In regard to this matter of electric lighting, which seems to have riveted special attention, and upon which this sharp debate has already broken out, I will say for myself that I am not going to enter into the discussion at present, but will say one word further by way of general explanation of the bill.

That is, that while the Commissioners recommended the increase of a large number of salaries, extending to a number of persons in the District employ, including, if you please, the whole of the fire department of the District, the bill does not contain a single independent increase of salary. Now, for those who are disappointed in this matter, and their name is legion in the District, let me say that the committee felt, at a time when the Treasury was empty, when times were hard, when confessedly the cost of living is low, not high, thereby enabling salaries heretofore fixed to amply meet demands under the present order of things, and the fact that so many are out of employment, without salaries of any kind, and are seeking employment; the fact, also, that while the laborer in many instances has had his wages reduced from the necessities of times, and the salaries already being received by these people being reasonable, that these, with many other considerations, would justify the committee in refusing all applications for increases of salary, although, let me say, Mr. Chairman, some of them were meritorious. There are some unfair discriminations as to salaries as they now stand, but we felt that we could not enter upon the readjustment of them at the present time, and therefore deferred it, as the diplomats say, till a more auspicious occasion; in short, till such time as business shall revive, prosperity shall return, and, under more economic laws, money again flow into the Treasury.

I may say in this connection that there is one clerk added to the collector's office, in which there was overwhelming proof of an insufficient supply of necessary help, at $1,000 per annum. There were a couple of elevator operators and a fireman made necessary because of the fact that the District Commissioners were occupying a very much larger building than heretofore, which gives ample accommodations for most of the various offices of the District, and we made this increase at this cost as well as the increase spoken of by the gentleman from Kansas in the number of policemen. This is the only increase of force provided for in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], that if we go to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs we shall get along really faster, more understandingly, and with satisfaction to everyone. Of course, if anyone chooses to address the committee now in a general way—in general debate—let him make it known, and I shall make no objection.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. Was the demand general from these laborers to have their salaries increased, or was it only in special or particular cases?

Mr. GROUT. There was a very general estimate for an increase in salaries.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is human nature, too.

Mr. HULICK. How many of these persons demanding an increase of wages proposed, in the event they did not get it, that they would retire from the service?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. None.

Mr. GROUT. None said so to us. It came to us as a rumor that their services might not be retained—fears were expressed that some would seek other employment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We could very well fill the places if they did go.

Mr. GROUT. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desire to occupy the floor?

Mr. DOCKERY. Only for a moment. I wish to make a single statement in this connection, and will then be content to have general debate closed, and that we thereafter proceed under the five-minute rule.

In further answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK], let me say that the demand for increases of salaries throughout the District is somewhat epidemic, as has been the case heretofore. This bill carries $343,422.86 less than the current law. It should be stated in justice, however, to the House Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress that this increase of the District bill was made by the Senate. The bill as it passed the House at the third session of the last Congress carried $25,853.14 less than the bill now reported by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT]. It appears, therefore, that the bill now under consideration is substantially, in amount, the same as the bill passed by the House at the third session of the last Congress. In the main the pending bill thoroughly and effectively illustrates the policy of judicious economy, of which the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and myself are such conspicuous exponents. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I will not further detain the committee.

Mr. GROUT. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand general debate has not yet been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] has the floor. To whom does the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if a member has not a right to the floor in his own time under general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has the floor at present.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not have to ask the gentleman from Vermont——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota knows he can not take the gentleman from Vermont from the floor without his permission.

Mr. PICKLER. The point is, I have a right to the floor in my own right in general debate without permission from anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Vermont yields the floor, but not before that time.

Mr. GROUT. Let me say to the gentleman from South Dakota that if he or any other member desires to enter into the discussion of this bill generally, in what is called general debate, there will be no objection to it. Any member may have such time as he wants now.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want to enter general debate, I want to ask a question or two.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; but we are trying to make progress with the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the gentleman asking?

Mr. GROUT. That we proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PICKLER. Before that, I have a matter that I could not get in in the five-minute debate, which I want to inquire about. I could not get it in when we are considering the bill by sections.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, you can get in; I will see that you do.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not understand just what people are asking for an increase of salary. I have a petition that I wanted to bring before the Committee on Appropriations. It has been before them heretofore, and it is in regard to the many charwomen in this city. Undoubtedly a great many of them are employed in institutions that are covered by this appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That matter comes in on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire, in my time, to have this petition read.

Mr. GROUT. As to charwomen, there are none provided for in this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to have this petition read in my time. It is short.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. GROUT. I want to get along in a good-natured way with this matter, if I can.

Mr. PICKLER. I had the floor, Mr. Chairman. We are all good-natured.

Mr. GROUT. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from South Dakota has the floor, except as he usurps it. I understand the floor is mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota has not yet been recognized.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I will wait until I can be recognized, if gentlemen do not want to concede anything.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will explain to me why he can not have this read under the five-minute rule, I will yield to him now.

Mr. PICKLER. Simply because some gentleman will get up and say this is out of order under the section which has been read.

Mr. GROUT. It will be no more out of order then than it is now.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes; indeed many things are in order in general debate that would not be in order under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have his memorial read.

Mr. PICKLER. I object to that. I do not ask unanimous consent. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I am standing here on my own right.

Mr. GROUT. Let the gentleman's paper be read. We will see if it will bring peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont can yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; I yield to the gentleman to have his paper read.

Mr. PICKLER. I will be recognized in my own right, Mr. Chairman. I thank the gentleman very kindly, but I will shortly be recognized in my own time.

Mr. GROUT. Not now, Mr. Chairman; I will have no dictation.

Mr. PICKLER. I will wait until my turn comes. I am much obliged to the gentleman for his kindness. Let the gentleman keep his temper.

Mr. GROUT. It is not my temper that is ruffled. Now I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the gentleman from Vermont has the floor. I see his colleague on the subcommittee—the gentleman from New Jersey—on the floor, and I suppose he wants to be heard. It seems to me the gentleman from South Dakota——

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a point of order. I want to know how the gentleman from Illinois obtains the floor.

Mr. CANNON. By the sufferance of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Vermont yielded the floor.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, gentlemen, just go on; we will see how you proceed.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman desires to address the committee in general debate, and will let it be known how much time he desires, I will yield to him.

Mr. PICKLER. A parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if the gentleman in charge of the bill controls general debate. The rule certainly always has been that the committee has the first right in general debate, and then, until it is closed, every member has the right to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Dakota that the gentleman from Vermont was recognized for general debate and has an hour, which has not yet expired. Until that time elapses he will have the floor; and in the meantime if he desires to make any motion limiting debate he can do so.

Mr. GROUT. I move that general debate be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is out of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. Division, Mr. Chairman. [Cries of "Oh!"]

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman desires more time, let him indicate what time he desires.

Mr. CANNON. I object.

Mr. PICKLER. I want ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I object, and call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4115) to amend section 1309 of the Revised Statutes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 285) for the relief of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa.;

A bill (S. 1582) to pay to the widow of the late Samuel F. Miller, a justice of the Supreme Court, a sum equal to the balance of his salary for the year in which he died; and Joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, if I can be recognized in my own time, I will withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. Regular order; let us have it.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 4; noes 45.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Vermont by increasing it from thirty minutes to two hours.

Mr. GROUT. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to amend the amendment by making it four hours.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the last amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let us have the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proposition of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. PICKLER. I moved that general debate be limited to two hours, and the gentleman from Vermont accepted it; but the gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. GROUT. Is it in order for me to withdraw my motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman from Vermont made a motion that all debate be closed in thirty minutes. The gentleman from South Dakota moved as an amendment that all debate be closed in two hours. The gentleman from Vermont accepted that. Therefore, the Chair thinks the gentleman can not withdraw his motion. The question is on limiting debate to two hours.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a point of order, under the rule, and also in the interest of harmony. The point of order is submitted under clause 5 of Rule XXIII, and in the hope that some amicable adjustment may be reached on the other side. General debate can not be closed by the Committee of the Whole. Debate can be closed in Committee of the Whole after debate under the five-minute rule has been entered upon, but general debate must be closed by the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in two hours on this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. The same point of order prevails against that that the gentleman from the other side made.

Mr. DOCKERY. We do not want two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that the rules of the Fifty-first Congress provided that general debate could be closed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my request so as to ask consent that general debate be closed in one hour.

Mr. PICKLER. The point of order has been made that the Committee of the Whole can not, under the rule, close general debate by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOCKERY. I never made any such point of order as that. Of course it can be done by unanimous consent, but not upon motion.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, is this question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that the Committee of the Whole can not close general debate except by unanimous consent. If the gentleman from Vermont desires to be heard upon the point of order, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. GROUT. I have not examined the rule and will not undertake to speak on that point now, but I am willing to submit to the judgment of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question can be decided by reference to the rules. The Chair was under the impression, as he has already stated, that under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress the Committee of the Whole could close general debate, but if no gentleman gives a reference to the rule, the Chair will hold——

Mr. DOCKERY. I will refer the Chair to the rule.

Mr. GROUT. Now, Mr. Chairman, will you let us have a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota limiting the time of debate to two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been raised against that amendment.

Mr. GROUT. I understood the Chair to overrule the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not overruled the point of order. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] wish to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. DOCKERY. Sections 5 and 6 of Rule XXIII settle the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read sections 5 and 6 of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. When general debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment; and neither an amendment nor an amendment to an amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

6. The committee may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only (which motion shall be decided without debate); but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed in thirty minutes, fifteen of which shall be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. That will suit me.

Mr. CANNON. If fifteen minutes is as much time as my colleague on the committee desires, I have no objection.

The question being taken on the request of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE for unanimous consent, there was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this committee, and especially the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, to the prayer of the petition here offered. It is one that has been before the Committee on Appropriations heretofore, and is, in my judgment, one of the most deserving applications that can be presented to that committee or to this House. I refer to the prayer of the charwomen employed in the Capitol and in the different governmental offices and buildings for an increase in their pay from $20 to $25 a month. I think there are about 500 of them interested in it, and I ask to have the petition read in my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest to the gentleman that that is a matter which is provided for on the legislative bill and not on this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I ask to have the petition read in my time.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned most respectfully beg leave to present this petition for the relief of the charwomen employed in the various Departments in the city of Washington. We most earnestly pray that their present compensation of $20 a month be increased by the slight sum of $5, to $25 per month, for the reasons following, briefly stated:

1. They are generally women of family or have those dependent on them whom the ties of nature require them to support—mothers, fathers, sisters, and children unable to maintain themselves.

2. The work they perform is "woman's work" of the hardest kind. On bended knees, with head prone to the ground, this work must be done. The position of the body and head, suggestive of vertigo and other affections, is an element of the work upon which too much stress can not be laid.

3. As to time, they are virtually employed as much time as watchmen, messengers, and other nonclassified inferior workers of the Government.

4. Rents are high and have increased immensely in late years, thus driving these women farther away from their work, to which they must walk for most obvious reasons.

5. The nature of their work evidently unfits them for other independent work during the day, and tells rapidly upon their constitutions. This is confirmed not only by observation, but statistics show that the women who draw the cars on the tramways in the low contracted galleries of European mines on their hands and knees are unhealthy and short lived.

6. Many of these women are the widows, wives, daughters of soldiers; preference, we understand, being given to that class in the selection.

7. It would seem to be a work of supererogation and impertinence to attempt further to present and elucidate the claims of these worthy claimants to the intelligent consideration of your honorable body, and we conclude and leave the matter with you, fervently hoping, in consideration of the winter being on us, that our prayers may be speedily granted.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago I heard a question of salaries discussed by some gentlemen, on this bill, and I do not understand exactly what salaries are covered by the bill, but I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] now whether any of these charwomen are appropriated for in this bill, or in what bill they are appropriated for?

Mr. GROUT. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKLER. They do not any of them come in this bill?

Mr. GROUT. None are in this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I simply desire on this occasion to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the petition of these charwomen and of others in their behalf. They have nobody here to champion their cause, but I trust that the subcommittee will give due consideration to their petition, because I am firmly of the opinion that if there is any class of employees anywhere in the city of Washington in the Government service who are entitled to an advance in their pay it is these poor women. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I should not have addressed the committee at this time concerning any of the provisions of this bill had it not been that I gathered from what has been said here that particular attention is to be directed to those provisions which pertain to street lighting in general and electric lighting in particular. Those matters have engaged the serious consideration of the Committee on Appropriations, and as I suppose I am to be held responsible, to a considerable extent, for a part of the provisions on that subject contained in the bill, I wish to say a few words now in explanation, although perhaps they would come in quite as properly later on in the discussion. If members will turn to page 15 of the bill they will find an appropriation "for illuminating material," etc., intended to provide for the lighting of the streets with gas, amounting to $122,000. The appropriation for the present year is $142,400. There is, therefore, a reduction in the appropriation for this purpose of $20,400. At the same time we increase the service in the streets, we provide for additional lamps to the number of 380, and we provide for keeping those lamps lighted a somewhat longer time each night. If any gentleman desires the figures I can give them now. We also provide that the contract for gaslighting shall be let at public competition, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder.

The next provision is that with regard to electric lighting. The current law provides an appropriation of $47,600 for electric lighting in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, for the purpose of "maintaining the existing service and necessary extensions," and at the same time it provides a certain time schedule, namely, from sunset to sunrise, and a certain maximum charge specified in the bill. The maximum price under the existing law is 40 cents per night for electric arc lights. We have limited that maximum to 28 cents per night, and we have done that after careful consideration. We have provided a sufficient appropriation for putting in 70 additional arc lights. We have provided, not that the specific service now in operation shall be maintained, but that the service shall cover the same streets and public places which are covered by the existing arc-light service; and for good and sufficient reasons, as it appeared to the committee after careful investigation, we have put in a proviso, which, I judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, will be attacked on a point of order.

The provisos to which I refer are, first—

That the entire service of electric lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor—

But more particularly the following:

That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with an underground system of wires and conduits in the streets and other places covered by such service the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground conduits and wires for electric lighting in and along such streets and other public places as may be necessary for said service, such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress, without compensation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to be heard later upon the point of order, if it is going to be insisted on, as I hope it will not be, that this proviso is obnoxious to the rules of this House. But we want to look straight in the face the main object aimed at in this proviso. The committee does not want to mislead any gentleman on this floor. We think it is not only, as it has been called, a somewhat radical provision, but that if carried out in good faith, as we have reason to hope it will be, it will result to the great benefit of the citizens of Washington and to the great benefit also of the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman believe it possible for any existing or nonexisting corporation to make an honest bona fide bid to light the city with gas, and then to lay pipes for that purpose within the year which the contract will provide for?

Mr. PITNEY. I am not now discussing the question of gaslighting; but I have no objection to answering the question.

Mr. HILL. I ask the same question in regard to electric lighting, if it is to be done by means of underground conduits?

Mr. PITNEY. With regard to electric lights, we are assured by persons of thorough responsibility that a company with a paid-up capital of $200,000 can, and if permitted will, come into competition, and if their bid be accepted will lay down conduits and wires in all the streets now covered by the electric-lighting system in seasonable time to enable them to commence the lighting at the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And with a proper bond behind them.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, sir; they propose to give a sufficient bond to do this. Now, the committee recommend this proposition in regard to electric lighting. They say, according to information which comes from a good source, that if this matter be left to the sound discretion of the Commissioners they will impose such stipulations as shall make it impossible for any "straw bidder" to come in and make a bid under this proviso.

Now, with regard to the gaslighting, I will say in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], that a practical proposition has not been made to our committee; but inasmuch as the committee, after careful hearings and investigations, determined that it was proper at this time to take this step opening the electric lighting to competition, it seemed no more than fair to open the gaslighting to similar competition. We have no information which renders us sure that competitors can be found in the business of gaslighting; but we thought we might encourage competitors to come forward, and if, between the present time and the time this bill becomes a law, any objection should be brought in that there is no practical proposition presented, some way to obviate that objection might be found.

Mr. HILL. Does not the gentleman see that the effect of a provision like this might be to encourage new organizations in each of these lines of business to undertake to tear up all the streets of the city every year?

Mr. PITNEY. The committee considered it a very serious question whether for the purpose of enabling bidders to compete the Commissioners ought to be authorized to permit the tearing up of the streets of Washington. The committee desire to preserve the streets of this city and also to have them well lighted at a reasonable cost to the Treasury. But the proviso in the bill does not authorize the tearing up of the streets for any other purpose than to enable a competing bidder, if successful, to comply with the contract that may be let.

Mr. HILL. Does not the organization of existing gas and electric light companies give Congress entire control of the prices at which they shall furnish light to the city? Has not Congress absolute legislative control over the existing companies?

Mr. NORTHWAY. We can not compel them to accept anything.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, that Congress can require the electric-light company or the gas company to perform the service if the company is not satisfied with the price which may be paid. We can determine that we will pay them 28 cents or 10 cents or 2 cents per light; and if they accept the price they will do the work; otherwise they will not.

Mr. GROUT. Let me say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that these companies do not give the right of which he speaks to Congress; but the right inheres in Congress to regulate this matter.

Mr. HILL. Exactly.

Mr. GROUT. But, further, let me say to the gentleman that these companies do not allow Congress peaceably to perform that function, and have not done so, as the history of legislation on this subject when fully developed will show.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey whether or not in his judgment Congress has the power to fix the compensation for the services of the gas company or the electric light company in this regard? Is not that power reserved in the articles of incorporation, and have we not authority to say now, not only the character of the gas that shall be furnished, but the price at which it shall be supplied, and has not Congress exercised that power, with reference to these local corporations, time and again?

Mr. PITNEY. Subject, of course, Mr. Chairman, to the superior information of the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that I do not understand that Congress has placed in the organic law of either of the companies in operation here—the gas company or the electric light company—the reservation that Congress may limit the price, for the very good reason that Congress did not organize or incorporate either of them. No; I will correct that statement. Congress did authorize the organization of the gas company, but not of the electric light company. That is a foreign corporation, which comes here and exercises a franchise by permission of Congress, exercising it for the supply of private citizens and for the lighting of the public streets of the city, and both the citizen and the public have the right to offer such price for the service as they may deem reasonable. If the company wish to accept it, and furnish the electric light for the price offered, they can do so. Otherwise, they are privileged not to accept it.

But since this point has been raised, let me say that it has occurred within the past year that the District Commissioners, acting under authority of the present appropriation act, which limits the maximum price paid for lighting the streets to 40 cents per light per night for each electric light, but which does not say that they shall pay that much, the Commissioners undertook in pursuance of that law to lower the price, the maximum price authorized to be paid, for the purpose of enabling them to use the surplus money to extend the service into other streets not then covered by the service; and the company took the ground that the Commissioners had gone beyond their authority under the law, and that they had no power to reduce the maximum price authorized, and so the company refused to enter into a contract to light the streets at $37\frac{43}{100}$ cents per light per night, insisting upon the full maximum price of 40 cents authorized by Congress. They did enter into a temporary arrangement respecting the matter, an arrangement which is now in force, but only as a temporary expedient.

Moreover, the electric light company now operating here claims that under existing law—and it deduces the claim from the appropriation bills of the last five years—that they have a monopoly of this business, and the point of order proposed to be made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], if it has any foundation, is based on the same ground, namely, that the company is now entitled to the monopoly.

Now, I will discuss the point of order when it is raised, but as to the advisability of this change—the pending question—there can be, in my opinion, no doubt that it is advisable to allow competition in this important public service if we can do it without too great a sacrifice of the good of the city with reference to the tearing up of the streets. Now, we have provided that that work shall be done under such reasonable restrictions as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall think proper to prescribe, they having the power to extend this privilege only to the company which shall make a successful bid, provided they are not already supplied with a subway for their wires.

I think I have replied to all the points involved in the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield to me for an interruption?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I notice that the committee closes each separate paragraph of this item by saying that "Congress may revoke this authority at will."

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is embodied in all of the appropriation bills.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is good as far as it goes. But the company or association, whichever it may be, that becomes the successful bidder under this provision would certainly have certain property in the way of its wires and conduits in the District, and would acquire, by virtue of this legislation, certain rights in connection with that property. What I should be glad to have the gentleman explain is how he regards this right, whether as equivalent to an incorporation under the District of Columbia, or what its relations would be to the body politic of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. I presume the relation existing between the electric light company and the body politic would be the relation of contractors with each other—the one making a contract with the other. The District Commissioners would make a contract with the electric light company for the current year. So far as the power granted by Congress is concerned, the Commissioners, under the authority of Congress, would grant a license to the electric company which became the successful bidder to lay down a subway at the risk of revocation at any time by Congress. Congress can revoke the power at any time under this provision of law.

Now, the privilege exercised by the present company arose by virtue of a provision or authorization placed in the appropriation bill passed some years ago, practically the same in terms as that now before this committee for its consideration.

In the appropriation act passed July 18, 1888, for the fiscal year then following, the Commissioners of the District were prohibited from permitting any more overhead wires to be strung, and were required, as this bill requires them, to light the city by means of a system of underground wires and lights, and it was provided that the Commissioners of the District might—

> Under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize the wires of any existing telegraph, telephone, or electric light company now operating in the District of Columbia to be laid under any street, alley, highway, footway, or sidewalk in the District, whenever, in their judgment, the public interest may require the exercise of such authority—such privileges as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation, and no such authority to be exercised after the termination of the present Congress.

That was the Fiftieth Congress, and that limit of time was afterwards extended. We did not put that limitation in this bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But there is one vast difference between that and the legislation now offered. That was limited to an existing company.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now you authorize any foreign corporation to come in here and acquire certain rights, it seems to me, by this legislation. That is, having expended, say, a million dollars, or a quarter of a million dollars, as the case may be, in these underground conduits, Congress will very naturally favor such a company or such an organization, and the query arises at the threshold, ought we thus in an indirect way to permit people to come into this city and acquire rights which will subsequently permit them to come before Congress with an additional claim for an act of incorporation?

Mr. GROUT. What does the gentleman propose touching that matter?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would drop it out altogether.

Mr. GROUT. And not have any competition?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It seems to me that, with the limitations you have put upon this bill as regards price, there is nothing left——

Mr. GROUT. Then you would not disturb those in possession of the conduits?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is not what I mean, but I would do this——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], and I should like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota yields to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PITNEY. Let me say, first, the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire was whether the license under the act of 1888 was not limited to the wires of the existing company. Yes, Mr. Chairman, and the present company hold that it gave them a monopoly and prevented the District Commissioners from making a contract with any other concern.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Unquestionably Congress can incorporate any other companies that it sees fit; but it seems to me that the legislation proposed in this bill seeks to accomplish without any incorporation that which various companies have been seeking from the authorities in this District for years and years, and that they should not indirectly accomplish in an appropriation bill that which Congress has heretofore refused in a special bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will permit, I will say to the gentleman that if a company without a charter makes this bid, it must get a charter, and therefore the gentleman's position is not tenable.

Mr. PITNEY. I can not remember all the questions which have been asked me.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is correct, then this legislation will have no effect whatever.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask if the Committee on Appropriations are doubtful as to whether under the present régime Congress has the power to limit the price?

Mr. PITNEY. We have no doubt that Congress has the right to limit the District Commissioners to a certain sum, and not to allow them to pay any more; but we do not find any law which authorizes Congress to compel the company to accept the price.

Mr. PICKLER. And the proposition is to get competition in the lighting of the city?

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; and the benefits will come not only to the public Treasury, in getting the public lighting done for a less amount, but it will result in competition for the patronage of citizens along the lines of the electric lighting companies, and will put the price down to a reasonable figure. The hearings before the committee showed that by the improved methods of manufacturing electricity introduced since the institution of this plant the cost can be most materially reduced and the profits of the company still be left at a reasonable figure.

Mr. HILL. The question that I wish to ask is this: You claim that Congress has no control over the fixing of prices by the existing company?

Mr. PITNEY. I can not answer that question any better than I have already done. We can fix the maximum, but we can not make the company take it.

Mr. HILL. Have you any greater control over the new company than you have over those that now exist?

Mr. PITNEY. We make two companies compete, instead of one company which claims to have a monopoly.

Mr. HILL. You will simply cause a consolidation unless you keep legislative control.

Mr. PITNEY. We do retain legislative control, by a provision in this bill under which we are able to revoke the authority to maintain electrical conduits and wires at any moment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to ask, if Congress controls the price of gas and has the authority to fix the price, what difference does it make to the people what companies it is taken from, provided that Congress does its duty?

Mr. PITNEY. Congress may control the price, but can not improve the quality.

Mr. BABCOCK. It has assumed authority to legislate as to the quality and as to price.

Mr. PITNEY. Well, I do not claim any special information on the question of gas.

Mr. BABCOCK. The House passed a bill last session requiring a standard of 22 candlepower.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Do you think it has ever reached that?

Mr. PITNEY. I do not claim to have any special information upon the gas question. The question of electric lighting was gone into very thoroughly, and is the one more particularly aimed at by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. While the object is undoubtedly good, I think the proper way to reach this subject is by giving a charter to these other companies, to afford competition. This throws the door wide open to anybody who wants to come in and make a contract for gas and electric lighting.

Mr. PITNEY. I believe my interrogator is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I should be very glad if he would report a bill to improve the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. We will have a gas bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey would not the result of this legislation if carried into law be simply this: You will enable people to come into the District of Columbia and exercise functions here without incorporation that they can not now exercise?

Mr. PITNEY. Just this once, for the sake of getting competition in this line.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And after they may have thus spent a million dollars under that authority, do you not think they would have certain claims, morally, at least, which they would not have in the incorporation?

Mr. GROUT. There is full power under existing law, the general incorporation act, to incorporate manufacturing companies; and what is a gas company but a manufacturing company. They can organize any time they choose under the general law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then the matter goes still further than I had suggested. We incorporate under the general law these companies and give them authority to tear up the streets of this city at their own sweet will.

Mr. PITNEY. Not at all.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And if this can be done in one appropriation act it can be done in every other.

Mr. PITNEY. I will not yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire unless I may have the privilege of answering his questions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Go on.

Mr. PITNEY. I say it does not give them the right at any time. It provides that they may exercise the privilege only once; that they may tear up the streets, but under such reasonable restrictions as the District Commissioners may prescribe.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And under the two provisions for gas and electric lighting, would it not amount to having the streets torn up this year and every year?

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, no; only once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that there might be a tearing up of the streets every year, and a multiplicity of companies come in, for merely speculative purposes, and after having torn up the streets and laid conduits they might fail to give the necessary service.

Mr. PITNEY. The idea of putting in that provision was simply as a safeguard. The practical difficulty which gave rise to this provision is this: The present electric light company claims a monopoly of the whole District, and that no other company may be authorized to put in a single underground conduit or overhead wire for the purpose of electric lights. They have instituted three suits enjoining the Commissioners from granting the privilege to another company at any time. A temporary injunction has been granted. The United States Electric Lighting Company, the complainants in these three suits, claim that they have a monopoly by reason of the provisions of appropriation bills, passed by previous Congresses, granting to them the privilege and limiting the time within which any such privilege could be granted to another company, so that the United States Electric Lighting Company now has, as it claims, the only privilege which can be granted by the Commissioners.

Now, we thought, upon careful investigation, that the time had come when at least one opportunity should be given to a bona fide company to come in and compete in this field.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. PITNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Your bill provides that Congress may revoke the right to maintain these conduits?

Mr. PITNEY. It does.

Mr. GARDNER. What do you contemplate is to become of them? They are there. You get clear of them by revoking the right to maintain them. That means, perhaps, that they are to be torn out. Now, who is to put the streets in proper order again?

Mr. PITNEY. The revocation of the right to maintain the conduits would not give to the company the right to tear up the soil for the purpose of taking them out. It would be simply a forfeiture of all the company's privileges.

Mr. GARDNER. It is a forfeiture. Then the provision in the bill is that Congress, by this legislation, invites bidders to lay conduits at an expense that I can not estimate, but half a million dollars, more or less, Congress reserving the right to make a revocation which will work a forfeiture. Is that the idea?

Mr. PITNEY. That is the idea to this extent: These people put their money into the ground in the same way that every water company, every gas company, every telephone company, every other company of this kind does. The money goes into the plant. It goes into the ground, and when the earth closes over it the plant is valueless if dug up again, and the only valuable right that remains is the right to use it for the public service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And they make their bids with full knowledge of that.

The time for general debate having expired, the Chairman directed the Clerk to read the bill by paragraphs for consideration under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the half of the following sums named, respectively, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the purposes following, being for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, namely.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, page 1 of the bill, and inserting the following in lieu thereof: "That the following sums named, respectively, are hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia for the purposes following, being for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, namely."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Pending the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the point of order?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order while I say a few words on the amendment.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; if the gentleman desires to be heard I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by me would make the appropriations carried by this bill payable out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. The bill as it stands requires that one-half of the sums thereby appropriated be paid out of the public Treasury and the other half out of the treasury of this District. Most of the items of these appropriations, as any gentleman can see by referring to the bill, are local and special, having reference solely to this District, and can not be said to be in any sense matters which concern the people of this nation. The amount carried by the bill is something over $5,000,000.

Among the items of annual appropriation are streets, country roads, etc., $458,800; public schools, $1,780,156; police, $576,730; over $1,200,000 for interest upon the old District of Columbia debt and on account of the sinking fund for its extinguishment, and so on.

The amendment which I offer is to conform to the real reading of this bill—the appropriations carried by it. The proposition of the bill is to make appropriations "for the expenses of the District of Columbia." Those expenses ought to be such as relate to the District government. I concede there are expenses which ought to be incurred here by the General Government and paid by the people at large. But only a small portion of such expenses are involved in this bill, and they can easily be provided for elsewhere. Among other things in the bill is an appropriation of $85,000 or $86,000 for private and sectarian charities. We find in the bill an appropriation for this or that foundling institution, or asylum, or hospital; for institutions for the dispensing of this or that charity under the auspices of this church organization or that church organization. While I have nothing to say about the usefulness and the merit of these various institutions, I do wish to say that I think it is not just to the people whom we represent in our several districts to compel them to pay half of the expenditures in the District of Columbia for these purposes, purely local and specially confined to the District.

Take schools. I am not here to say a word against the public schools. On the contrary, I am their friend, and on proper lines and within proper bounds would go as far as any gentleman to encourage and foster them. The people of my district and the people of all the several districts represented on this floor are, I take it, supporting their own public schools, educating their own children out of their substance by tax money, providing themselves for these necessary and most noble public institutions. Why should they, after doing that, be forced to provide also half of the money necessary or half of the money expended in building houses, paying teachers, and generally conducting the schools of this District?

Taxation in this District upon the average is lower than throughout the States; would be lower, if the people here should meet all these local expenditures themselves, than taxation in three-fourths of the districts represented on this floor. I had occasion some time since to look into this matter; and I found that, generally speaking, with the exception of some municipalities in New England—some of those small towns where expenses are exceedingly light, and where, as a consequence, I take it, the government is exceedingly good—with the exception of the municipal expenses in some of the New England States, especially in some of the smaller towns and boroughs in those States, taxation all over this country, East and West, North and South, is higher than taxation would be here if the people of this District bore all the expenses incident to carrying on their own government and taking care of their own local concerns.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: The General Government owns in this District an immense amount of property—property belonging to the people of the United States——

Mr. MEREDITH. More than one-half of the property within the city.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Fully one-half, and I have seen it stated frequently more than one-half of all the property within the city.

Now, does not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] think that the Government ought to bear its proportionate amount of taxation on the immense quantity of property which it owns here?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] suggests that the Government owns half or more than half of all the property of this District, and he asks me whether I do not think that in view of this fact the Government ought to pay a portion of the taxes of the District. First, I do not believe that the claim that the Government owns half the property in this District is well founded. But, for the purpose of the argument, let that be conceded; I care not as to that. I answer the question, and I say "no." Such a thing as the Government paying tax upon its own property is an anomaly, an unheard-of thing. I say further, however—I am not trying to escape upon any quibble—I say the Government ought to take care of the expenses incident to and required by such property as the Government has in this District and elsewhere. Whether those expenses be great or small, I say they ought to be borne by the people of the United States. If there is an appropriation in this bill for any purpose that has reference to property of the Government of the United States, I say that the Government ought to pay not only one-half of such expense, but that it ought to pay all of it, and that the people of the District ought to be relieved of any burden of that kind, except that which they bear in meeting their proportional part as citizens of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should like to occupy a few moments more, if the House will indulge me.

Mr. DOCKERY. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Five minutes will suffice.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND] be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am obliged to the House for this extension of time and I will not abuse the courtesy. The question under discussion is one which it seems to me is well worthy of discussion in this House.

Now, I am not urging any proposition here in a spirit hostile to the District, or to the beautiful city of Washington, or to any of the interests of this city, or this District, or to any of the people in the city or District. To my mind—of course I may look at the subject wrongly—it is a question of simple fairness and justice. Shall the people of your districts and mine, after contributing of their substance to carry on local government in their several townships, towns, cities, and States, be compelled to pay also half of what is laid out for the benefit of people living in this favored city? Such, I think, is the proposition. Take the matter of the public schools, for instance. Can any member on this floor suggest a good reason, an honest reason, why the people of his district or my district should be taxed in order to pay a dollar for every dollar that is contributed by the people of the District of Columbia for the education of their own children?

Mr. MEREDITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEREDITH. I wish to ask if the gentleman does not know it to be a fact that there are thousands of children here from the States who, by reason of the fact that this is the head of the National Government, are brought here from the different States by people who are temporarily here, and are being educated in the schools of the District?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Including the children of members of Congress and all the officials of the Government.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, of course I can not, and do not, undertake to say how many children, or whose children, are brought here from the different States of the Union to be educated in the schools of the District. But I do say that the people of the United States are not justly chargeable with any responsibility for their education.

It has been suggested by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] that included in the schools of the District are children of the members of Congress. Shall we be told, sir, that the people of his district and mine are to contribute their one-half of the million of dollars of this appropriation in order that his children and mine, and the children of other Members and Senators, may be educated here? For me, I ask not the people of my district to pay for the education of my children in these schools; I ask not that they be kept open for that purpose; I ask not that my children be admitted to them at all, if that admission is to carry with it a suggestion that as a member of this body I shall sanction, either indirectly by my silence or directly by my vote, the compelling of the people of my district to contribute toward raising the million of dollars for school purposes in the District of Columbia.

But take account of the Government property located here. The Government owns this Capitol building; but, Mr. Chairman, we ought not to forget the fact that but for this building and the other buildings of the Government in this city, now stretching and spreading far and wide the magnificent capital of the American nation, there would be but the swamps in which sportive gentlemen could go duck shooting, and no doubt find abundance of game without going very far, either. Washington is just what the people of the United States have made it. The public buildings, the Government improvements erected here, were erected at the expense of the people of the United States, and they are what has given value and permanence to everything worth thinking of in this city. As well talk of taxing the court-house in the poorest county in the Union; as well talk of taxing the jail that shelters criminals and protects and guards society from their dangerous attacks, as to talk of taxing this building, the White House, or the Treasury, or the Pension building, or the War and Navy building, or any other of the great structures in the city of Washington belonging to the people of the United States. Nowhere except here is such public property regarded as the just subject or object of taxation.

Now, let the Government pay all it should pay for improving, protecting, beautifying, taking care of its own property, but let not the people who sent us here be compelled by Congress to pay what ought to be levied on the private property of the people of this District.

I have said all I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. GROUT. I suppose now that the point of order will be disposed of.

Mr. DE ARMOND. What is the point of order? I did not understand it.

Mr. GROUT. That it changes existing law, and it is all stated in a nut shell in Rule XXI, paragraph 2, the last clause, which says:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in a general appropriation bill or any amendment thereto.

And the organic act, section 16, says:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve such estimates, Congress shall appropriate to the amount of 50 per cent thereof.

This amendment of the gentleman changes, therefore, the existing law, and the provision under the former rule that it reduced expenditures does not apply under the present rule.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me for a few moments, reserving the point of order?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask my friend from Vermont for sufficient time to make a statement in support of the suggestion embodied in the question I submitted to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] in regard to the value of Government property in the District of Columbia.

I hold in my hand a report from the office of the assessors for the District of Columbia, dated April 28, 1894, and in it is given the taxable values of all the property in the District. It shows that the valuation of private property subject to taxation is $191,417,804. Of course, the same board of assessment which assessed the private property assessed the Government property of every kind and character in the District, and this report gives the exempt property in the District of Columbia, as follows:

United States property:
Value of land, not including streets and alleys	$98,705,639
Value of improvements	99,352,500
Total United States property	198,058,139

or over seven millions more than all the private property, valued on a very fair and reasonable assessment, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENRY. Does that include parks?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I think not. I say this was a very fair assessment. In the Fifty-second Congress I had the honor to serve on a committee to investigate the tax assessments in the District of Columbia, and we very thoroughly overhauled the work of the board of assessors at that time. We started in with the idea that the assessment was inadequate, that it was too low; but we became thoroughly convinced before we finished that it was exceedingly fair, and equaled the average in any other similar community in the United States. Under these circumstances, I think the people of the United States, the people of my district, and the people of the district of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] would be very willing to pay their proportionate expense of the Government, even if the law was not as it is.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question, if he will yield to me.

Mr. WASHINGTON. My time has expired, but if I may have additional time I will be glad to answer any question which the gentleman desires to ask.

Mr. GROUT. I yield sufficient time for the gentleman's reply.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the rate of taxation in his State, including State, county, road, school, and various items of taxation that go to make up the total, does not amount to more than $1.50 on the hundred, the highest rate of taxation known in this District?

Mr. WASHINGTON. In answer to the gentleman I will state that in the county in which I live we have no city tax, but the State and county tax for all purposes is about 1 per cent on a much lower valuation of property than that which prevails here. I think in the city of Nashville it is higher than it is here, because we have to pay taxes for three distinct forms of government—for the State, for the county, and for the municipality. There are three distinct forms of government that must be maintained by local taxation. Here you have but one form of government, because of the peculiar conditions that surround the District. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the committee, I will publish as part of my remarks the report from which I have quoted.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no more time.

Mr. GROUT. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia such time as he desires, leaving the point of order pending.

Mr. MEREDITH. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] as I understand it, is in the line of the theory of my friend, which has been pressed upon this House time and again. The object which the gentleman from Missouri has in view, if we may judge by what has arisen here before, is to put upon the District of Columbia the entire expense of running the District government. My friend ignores the fact that this is the capital of a nation of seventy millions of people. But if that is to be ignored, Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to call his attention to the fact which has been shown by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], when he read from the report of the assessor that there is very much more property owned by the General Government in this city than is owned by private individuals.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman kindly permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEREDITH. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should like to ask what property that is? Will you specify some of the items?

Mr. MEREDITH. I have not the statement of the assessor before me.

Mr. DE ARMOND. This Capitol is the first item, is it not?

Mr. MEREDITH. The Capitol where we are assembled is a part of the property.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman means this Capitol and similar property?

Mr. MEREDITH. The public streets and public parks of this city are owned by the General Government. When the first owners of the soil granted to the Government these lots, which have been reserved from that day to the present, they gave this property freely, and they gave an amount of property, as I understand, to the Government equal to that which is now occupied by the citizens of this District. Yet my friend seems to be astonished that the Government should be called upon, and that his district should be required to pay a part of the school expenses for the education of children in this District. I desire to call his attention to the fact that there are thousands of officeholders here, many of them from his district, some of whom he has brought here.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Not many, let me tell you. They have a different kind of fellows in the offices. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he takes the position that the people back at home ought to pay for educating the children of officeholders who are here, and who get much better salaries than the people at home make by ten times as much labor?

Mr. MEREDITH. I take the position that if the people who are here temporarily residing, and who pay taxes at home in your district and my district, to their State governments, who pay the taxes that are assessed against them, when they are brought here to fill official positions to which they have been appointed, they are entitled to have their children educated here, and it is no more than right and just that the Government should pay its proportion.

For years and years the Government of the United States has borne dollar for dollar with that borne by the city, and gentlemen who live in distant States have been unable to realize the fact of its propriety and justice. It is the duty of the Government, in my judgment, and it has been the duty in the judgment of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is composed of gentlemen from all over this country; and it is but fair and just that those obligations should be borne equally by the Government and by the District of Columbia. My friend behind me has properly suggested that this District occupies the condition of a Territory; but above and beyond all that, this is the national city, the national city of a nation composed of 70,000,000 people; and I say that each member of Congress, I do not care whether he comes from the State of Missouri or what State he comes from, ought to take a just pride in this national city, and ought to be willing to contribute from the revenues of the Government its just proportion, especially when the Government owns more than one-half of all the real estate of this District, when we come to the assessor's statement, which has been shown by my friend from Tennessee.

Now, I have been on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and these matters have come before us time and time again, and we have found that some gentlemen were very hard to be converted to the fact that it is absolutely just that the Government should bear its just proportion of the obligations which rest upon this District; and we have found that my friend from Missouri time and time has endeavored by amendment and otherwise to put the entire expenses of this District upon the District, and to relieve the Government from any expense whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. GROUT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the point of order, but for one reason. Of course I assume that the point of order will be decided fatally to the amendment; but the discussion had is calculated to prejudice the mind of the committee against this city. The argument offered in support of it is calculated to mislead the minds of a number of members; so I will state that in previous Congresses this has been gone over again and again.

I simply want to say a few words for the purpose of correcting any erroneous impression that may have been created by that argument. This is not the city of Washington alone; it is the capital city of the United States of America. It belongs to us as a nation, and since the Blackburn Act of 1878, that gave us the present form of government—what is known as the half-and-half rule—this city has been picked up out of the mud and dirt and a condition of disgrace to the Republic, and made the first city in the world; something that an American can be proud of. The people of the District have literally no control over this property.

The United States is the great owner. This is the capital city, to be visited by us, by our constituents, and by all our people. It is under our absolute control; and, as I have often said, this body is the city council for the District. We make its laws and control it; and it will be a mistake to ever go back to the period antedating 1878, when we adopted the present system. We now educate our children here. We have an army of over 20,000 citizens from other States doing the business of the Government here; and I hope no feeling in this House against this city will enter into the minds of this committee because of this amendment and the discussion had thereon. I believe in the present system, and I hope that the members of Congress will feel a responsibility resting upon them to study this District and its necessities, and treat it with the same reason and fair play that they would the city or town of their own home.

Mr. GROUT. If the Chair is ready to rule, I do not desire to say anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I beg to ask the gentleman from Vermont if he has the law before him, the law of 1878; and I will ask him whether the provision is not with reference to the "government" of the District of Columbia? The bill itself covers items that are totally distinct from governmental expenses.

Mr. GROUT. To what items does the gentleman allude?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I allude to such things as schools, for instance, charitable institutions, streets, sidewalks, etc., expenses incurred in other localities and borne in other localities by individuals owning the abutting property. The point I submit is that as to all these things they are not properly included within items of governmental expense or for the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROUT. Now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to that I will say that the law requires that estimates be submitted covering every expense of the city.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Vermont that the Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman asked me a question and I was simply answering it.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMPROVEMENTS AND REPAIRS.

For work on streets and avenues named in Appendix X, Book of Estimates, 1897, $100,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioners upon streets and avenues specified in the schedules named in said appendix and in the aggregate for each schedule as stated herein, namely:

Georgetown schedule, $9,000.
Northwest section schedule, $30,000.
Southwest section schedule, $15,000.
Southeast section schedule, $23,000.
Northeast section schedule, $23,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether these items have not been materially reduced below the ordinary appropriations for these purposes?

Mr. GROUT. They have been reduced in the aggregate $44,500 below the appropriation for the current year, and the reduced amount is distributed pro rata among the different sections of the city as specified in the bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the amounts for these several sections are not equal to the amounts appropriated under the same heads in the last bill?

Mr. GROUT. No; the aggregate is $44,500 less than the appropriation for like purposes in the current law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amount of this appropriation be increased by adding $44,000, to be distributed pro rata among the several sections named in the bill.

The amendment of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire was read, as follows:

Page 11, line 7, insert before the word "thousand" the words "and forty-four"; so as to make the appropriation read: "$144,000."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs to pavements: For renewal, resurfacing, and repairs to concrete pavements with the same or other not inferior material, $150,000.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 16, page 11, strike out the words "and fifty," making the clause read: "$100,000."

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment principally for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the attention of members of the House generally to the outrageous tearing up, cutting up, and obstructing of the fine streets of this city for the purpose of so-called "repairing"; for I assert that more than one-half of the money that has been expended, nominally for the repair of the pavements of this city, since I have been here during the past twelve years, has resulted in actual detriment to the streets. There can not be any question that more than 50 per cent of the money so expended has been expended to the actual injury of the streets of Washington.

Three years ago one of the streets here on Capitol Hill that had not a break in it was invaded by these "repairers"; they came and made their chalk marks and drew their lines around little depressions in the pavement, many of them not half an inch below the ordinary surface of the street, the pavement being perfectly sound; they set their men at work to cut out 2 inches deep of solid asphalt, and then put in some new material, leaving it, in almost every case, as far above the common surface of the pavement as the spot had previously been below it. I suggest to gentlemen present that when they see gangs of these repairers at work upon the streets of this city, they go and observe how they do the work. If you can catch them when they are marking it out, just notice the number of places, of from 10 or 12 inches to a yard in diameter; proposing to cut out perfectly sound pavement merely where the surface is a little depressed. Any gentleman can verify my statements if he will only take the trouble to observe these people at work.

I want to make one other statement. I ask members of the House to observe the next crowd that they see repairing the streets and see the manner in which they work. If I can not take ten ordinary laboring men and do more work in a day than a hundred of these fellows can do, then I will acknowledge that I do not know anything about the subject. [Laughter.] You will find them in sections standing idly by, looking on to see what the others are doing. Somebody is paying them for doing that. Now, I wish it understood that I do not object to any proper expenditure for the improvement of the streets of this city. What I do object to is the tearing up of these fine streets all the time. In the city where I live we have bituminous paved streets the same as these in Washington, there being, perhaps, a little difference in the quality of the bitumen and the asphaltum used here.

Those streets in my city have to bear heavy traffic; some of them are in the neighborhood of steamship wharves, where five and six tons are put upon a truck and hauled over the streets, and yet those pavements have not been repaired and have not needed repairs in the last five years; and I assert that in nine cases out of ten where the streets of Washington are cut into for the alleged purpose of "repairing" the result has been actual damage to the streets. If heretofore we have appropriated money enough to repair the streets of this city, then I assert that one-half of this appropriation is all that is required for doing the necessary work for the next year. If these men must be employed, employ them; if they must be paid, pay them; but do not let them destroy the beautiful streets of this city. There has hardly been a fair day during the time when I have been here when the streets of this city have not been barricaded at some point in order that somebody might get paid for doing so-called repairing where in reality it was not needed.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, ought to be adopted, but, as I said at the beginning, I have offered it rather for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on Appropriations and of the members of the House to this matter. Again, I say to members the next time you see "repairs" going on in our streets, investigate the matter personally and see how they are made and how the men work.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill one question. I have seen it reported in the papers and in other publications that Washington is the cheapest governed city in the country, and its government is run at less expense in proportion to the population than that of any other city. Is that true?

Mr. GROUT. I have not investigated that question, but I think it will be found that the cost of governing this city is not exorbitant as compared with the cost of governing other cities—possibly the expense here would be found below that in other cities.

Mr. SPERRY. The reports say that this is the most cheaply governed city.

Mr. GROUT. I presume that is true.

Mr. BOWERS. That does not affect this question at all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BOWERS, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs, county roads: For current work of repairs of county roads and suburban streets, $40,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the repair of all county roads, except such as are rendered useless by the opening and improving of new highways established under the act approved March 2, 1893.

Mr. HULICK. In reference to the provision just read, I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] whether the committee has taken into consideration the judgment of the court declaring unconstitutional the act establishing a system of highways?

Mr. GROUT. Acting upon that decision, the committee refused to make an appropriation for further carrying out that act, as will be found when we reach that paragraph in the bill relating to that matter. But the present provision refers to what has been already done. It is made necessary by work already inaugurated and partly accomplished under the act referred to.

Mr. HULICK. Then this is not affected by the decision of the court?

Mr. GROUT. Not at all.

Mr. HULICK. I did not know whether the appropriation would be affected by that decision or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction of county roads: For construction of county roads and suburban streets, as follows:

For grading and regulating Sherman avenue, Roanoke and Irving streets, continuing improvement, $10,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for removing buildings, terracing banks, and replacing fences of Garfield Hospital grounds and other premises abutting on Sherman avenue between Grant and Princeton streets: Provided, That the owners thereof dedicate to the District of Columbia the ground for widening Sherman avenue in conformity with the adopted and recorded plans of highway extensions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I should like to have the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] explain this provision in regard to the Garfield Hospital grounds. I should like to hear something in reference to the relation of those grounds to the streets here referred to, and how the grounds will be left when the proposed improvement has been made.

Mr. GROUT. I do not know that I can give any further explanation than is afforded by the language of the bill itself. It says:

This appropriation shall be available for removing buildings, terracing banks, and replacing fences of Garfield Hospital grounds and other premises abutting on Sherman avenue, between Grant and Princeton streets: Provided, etc.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I have been informed that this grading and regulating of Sherman avenue, Roanoke and Irving streets, makes a deep cut into the grounds of the Garfield Hospital property, leaving those grounds in some cases 10, 15, or 20 feet above grade. The question in my mind is whether that is an appropriate thing to be done at all. I should like to know whether the committee has looked into that part of this appropriation and ascertained its probable effect.

Mr. GROUT. The attention of the committee was not called to that particular view of the case. This provision has been recommended by the Commissioners, and very likely, as there is mention made here of "terracing banks" and the like, it may carry the streets below the grade, making these terraces necessary; but when the improvement is completed it is supposed (although there was no investigation before the committee on that point) that it will leave the situation in equally good shape, or that some other counterbalancing advantage will be obtained. We did not investigate this question particularly.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] that this subject was referred to, as I think the gentleman from Vermont will recall, in the hearings before the subcommittee, and the Commissioners recommended this particular improvement as most important. They said there was a large bank which they desired to remove.

Mr. GROUT. That is just what I stated—that the Commissioners recommended this provision. They testified before us. There was no issue raised as to the propriety of the provision. That is what I meant by saying that it was not specially investigated.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he think that under existing law the District ought to pay for terracing the grounds around the hospital and replacing the fences? When it may be necessary to cut away those grounds, in order to bring the street to the proper grade, ought not that charge to be borne by the property itself?

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman will observe the proviso to the paragraph:

Provided, That the owners thereof dedicate to the District of Columbia the ground for widening Sherman avenue in conformity with the adopted and recorded plans of highway extension.

Now, it is supposed to be a most desirable thing for the public that this avenue should be widened; and as it was submitted to us without objection from anyone, and as it met the approval of the Commissioners, I will say it was probably thought that if the owners would contribute the ground for widening the street the Government could afford to do the balance, and that the result when the work was accomplished would be all the better for everybody concerned.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will not the resulting benefits to the abutting property from the widening of this street be sufficient compensation to the owners for giving up their land?

Mr. GROUT. That I can not say; that matter was not inquired into, because no issue was made. We took the provision upon the recommendation of the Commissioners; and as nobody objected, we supposed it to be correct. It certainly looked reasonable.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I raised my inquiry because I have been informed (though I have not investigated the matter myself and therefore do not speak from my own knowledge) that this improvement is a material detriment to the hospital grounds, although a great improvement to the other property adjoining the widened streets. I do not make any motion because I have no personal knowledge of the matter. I have stated my information on the subject. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

Lighting: For illuminating material, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, and cleaning public lamps on avenues, streets, roads, and alleys; purchasing and expense of erecting new lamp-posts, street designations, lanterns, and fixtures; moving lamp-posts, painting lamp-posts and lanterns; replacing and repairing lamp-posts and lanterns damaged or unfit for service; for storage and cartage of material, $122,000: Provided, That no more than $16 per annum for each street lamp shall be paid for gas or oil, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, painting, and cleaning, under any expenditure provided for in this act: Provided, That all of said lamps shall burn every night, on the average, from forty-five minutes after sunset to forty-five minutes before sunrise: Provided further, That before any expenditures are made from the appropriations herein provided for the contracting gas companies shall equip each street lamp with a self-regulating burner and tip, so combined and adjusted as to secure, under all ordinary variations of pressure and density, a consumption of six cubic feet of gas per hour: Provided further, That the entire service of gas lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor: Provided further, That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with a system of underground pipes for the purpose of conducting gas in the streets, roads, and alleys to be lighted hereunder, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground pipes for said purpose in and along such streets, roads, and alleys as may be necessary for said service; such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against all this paragraph after the word "therefore," in line 13, down to the close of the paragraph, and refer the Chair, in support of the point of order, to the final clause of paragraph 2, Rule XXI:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read section 268 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, bearing upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any person shall alter or in any manner obstruct or encroach on a public road, or cut, destroy, deface, or remove any milestones set up on such road, or place any rubbish, dirt, logs, or make any pit or hole therein, such person may be indicted, and upon conviction thereof before the proper court, shall be fined and imprisoned in the discretion of the court, according to the nature of the offense.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, there is no authority for this provision in the pending bill. It authorizes the successful bidders to make holes in the roads of the District of Columbia and to place obstructions thereon, contrary to existing law. It is an extension of legislation, on general principles, giving the Commissioners authority not warranted by law, and should be stricken out. I leave the question to the Chair, reserving my time.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, if that is the law my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] had in mind when he said that this was without authority of law, and that we would be shown the law which prohibited the opening up of streets for the purpose of laying conduits as contemplated in the pending bill, I can only say that for myself I fail to see that it has the slightest application to the question in hand. The provision read refers to an unauthorized act, unauthorized by the executive power of the District of Columbia—that is to say, the Commissioners—in the way of obstructing or tearing up or interfering with the public streets, and concerning this there can be no question whatever. This provision, however, in the pending bill provides that it may be done under the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who have charge of the streets and alleys of the District under the law.

Now, unless there be some good authority produced, prohibiting the Commissioners of the District from authorizing the streets to be opened for this necessary purpose, for lighting them either by gas or electricity, and for the purpose of opening the streets to supply the people with water, then there can be no possible ground on which the point of order can rest.

The organic act confers on the executive power of the District of Columbia authority to grant permits for such necessary purposes as are contemplated in the law, and when that authority is granted, it is in entire accordance with the law. Water and light are essential to the good order and proper government of any city. The opening of the streets that a supply of both may be furnished are absolutely necessary; and this provision of the bill only seeks to put a limitation upon it, instead of operating as an enlargement of the power. It says that it may be done, but not without the consent of the Commissioners. No man may do it of his own will. He shall do it only in obedience to, and under the direction of, the executive power of the District of Columbia.

It seems to me that there is no possible ground on which the point of order can for a moment be entertained.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say a word in reference to the point of order.

The section cited by the gentleman from New Hampshire as embodying the existing law, which he contends operates as a bar to the provision contained in this appropriation bill, is a statute to prevent malicious mischief on the public highways and prohibiting a public nuisance to be maintained upon them. It has no reference to the lawful care and control of the streets or to the power which exists by law in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to control the streets, roads, and avenues of the District.

The statute to which the gentleman refers is in these terms:

If any person shall alter or in any manner obstruct or encroach on a public road, or cut, destroy, deface, or remove any milestones set up on such roads, or place any rubbish, dirt, logs, or make any pit or hole therein, such person may be indicted, and upon conviction thereof before the proper court, shall be fined or imprisoned in the discretion of the court according to the nature of the offense.

The intention is to make it a criminal offense to commit such malicious mischief upon the roads, and in order to show that such was the intent of the lawmaking power a marginal note is appended which gives an index or contains a description of the statute in the following words:

Penalty for willful injury to public roads.

This proviso, Mr. Chairman, in the bill now before us is an incident to the main object of the section, which is to make an appropriation of money. Suppose, sir, there were no system of gaslighting here in this District. Suppose there were not a pipe laid under the ground for that purpose—and we all know that that is the only way in which gas can be distributed to light the streets—suppose that not a pipe was underneath the surface of the streets, undoubtedly Congress has the power to grant money to light the streets, for the law contemplates that they shall be lighted. Then we say in an appropriation bill that so much money shall be spent to light them with gas. In the case supposed, there being no gas pipes under the streets, we must as a necessary incident to the appropriation for the purpose of lighting the streets grant to somebody the privilege of laying a system of gas pipes under the streets. Inasmuch as it must be done by a pipe, the District Commissioners are allowed to authorize the company which furnishes the light to lay mains under the streets. That is all.

Now, whatever would be permissible under this bill—supposing that there were no system of gas mains in the streets—is permissible in case a new company comes into the District to operate here under this law. This simply gives to the successful company—the company that makes the successful bid, under the terms of this appropriation bill—the right to lay its mains or pipes in the streets.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No one will dispute that.

Mr. PITNEY. Therefore it is simply the grant of an incidental power, necessary for the carrying out of the purpose of a lawful appropriation.

Mr. GROUT. Call it a privilege instead of a power.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; it is a grant to the Commissioners, of the lawful power to grant a privilege to a citizen of this or some other State, for the purpose of enabling such citizen or company to carry on a useful public purpose, which Congress is under the duty of appropriating money to sustain.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman himself has admitted my entire contention. It is a grant contrary to law; consequently it changes existing law. It undertakes to legislate in an appropriation bill concerning something which is not an appropriation. The statutes of the District of Columbia have made it an offense, punishable by fine, to dig into the streets of the city, to make pitfalls there, or to obstruct them; and a person doing so may be imprisoned. The proposed legislation says that a person doing it under certain conditions shall not be imprisoned or fined. Evidently it is a change of existing law, and if it were not a change of existing law there would be no necessity for it here at all. Therefore, it comes plainly within the provisions of the clause to which I have referred in Rule XXI. Without the proposed grant of power the Commissioners could not do it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, as the law stands to-day there is no requirement upon the part of the District Commissioners to let the contract for the furnishing of gas to the lowest bidder. This provision requires that they should do so. That is a change in existing law.

Again, let me illustrate the other proposition. Under existing law the gentleman who has charge of this bill has no authority to in any way deface the streets of the city of Washington. He can not dig up the surface. He is prohibited from that. Now he seeks by changing the law to secure the power to do it. How? First, by becoming a bidder for the furnishing of gas to the city of Washington. To-day he can not, by bidding upon any contract of that character, be authorized to tear up the streets. The law forbids him doing it. He is seeking now to secure such a change in the statute as will authorize him to do that. Is not that the kind of a change of existing law which is prohibited in this class of legislation?

Again, there is but one organization in the city of Washington that is authorized by law to furnish gas for consumption. This bill proposes to change that statute and to authorize a certain one this year, another next year, and another the third year, to furnish gas to the city of Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be understood as opposing any legislation that reduces the price of gas to the consumer, but I insist that this legislation is not only obnoxious to our rules, but is entirely unnecessary. The committee are trying to effect a reduction in cost——

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question? I understand the gentleman's position to be that the present gas company now operating in Washington have an exclusive franchise for that purpose, and that we can not authorize any other company to light the streets without changing existing law. Has the gentleman's attention been directed to the seventh section and the ninth section of the organic act incorporating the Washington Gas Light Company? The seventh section gives that company the right to lay pipes for the purpose of conducting gas, in any of the streets, avenues, and alleys of the said city, and the ninth section provides that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any person or persons, or any incorporated company hereafter to be created by Congress for that purpose, from engaging in and pursuing the business specified in the seventh section of this act.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is all right, sir. Now the gentleman proposes to authorize these other persons to destroy this monopoly by engaging in this business.

Mr. HILL. Without being incorporated?

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). Which they can not do until there is a change in existing law. That establishes my proposition, I think, very satisfactorily.

Mr. PITNEY. The law itself provides that they shall not have a monopoly, and that nothing shall prevent Congress from giving the right to others to engage in this business.

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly Congress can do it, just as it can do anything else; but what I am objecting to is the attempt to do it in this act, which is forbidden by the rules of this House. No one doubts but that Congress has the power to authorize any other corporation to serve the people of this city in this way. There is no question about that. That is not the subject of dispute. The question at issue is whether or not that power can be exercised under our rules in this way and at this time and upon this bill.

Mr. GROUT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GROUT. Which section are you talking about—the one relating to gas or electricity?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am talking about this one to which objection has been made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, whether the proposition is meritorious or not as contained in the bill, I will not at this time discuss. That it is not subject to the point of order seems to me plain. Now, what does the section do? It appropriates money for lighting the city—for lighting by lamps on avenues, streets, roads, and alleys, etc., of the city. Now, lighting the city of Washington is evidently a public object for which we can appropriate money. If that is true, it necessarily follows that we can procure lighting through appropriations, as we may provide or limit in a clause making the appropriation. In other words, this appropriation is made for a public object. Now, we can, if we choose, contract that this money shall be used for hanging old-fashioned tin lanterns upon posts to be erected on every street corner.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is no law against that. That is a different thing.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; that involves the planting of the post and hanging the lantern. In other words, lighting the city of Washington is the performance of a municipal duty, and when we appropriate the money we may provide how it shall be expended.

Now, what does this clause do? Very properly it seems to me, within the rule, it provides as follows:

Provided, That all lamps shall burn every night on an average from sunset to sunrise, substantially: Provided, That there shall be certain equipments as to the lamps.

Provided further. That the entire service of gaslighting authorized by this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor—

The gentleman from Iowa says no, and says that is legislation. Oh, no; that provides how the money shall be expended in lighting the city, and is in order, as it seems to me, beyond a question. It necessarily follows from authority to appropriate. What next?—

That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with a system of underground pipes for the purpose of conducting the gas in the streets, roads, and alleys to be lighted hereunder—

That is, under this appropriation for the public lighting—

the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground pipes for said purpose in and along such streets, roads, and alleys as may be necessary for said service—

What service? Why the service of lighting the city—

such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation.

Now, having that power, we may place the limitation upon the use of the money. We have a gas company now in the city.

It is in the city under a charter, and has laid the mains. Now, this gentleman's contention is that we can not regulate on an appropriation bill in any way or shape the lighting by gas, except to utilize the company that now exists, because, he says, it changes existing law.

Well, there have been a good many rulings along this line, not upon this exact kind of an amendment, but substantially the same as this amendment. The rule itself is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

Is not this expenditure for lighting authorized by law, and is it not competent for us to say whether it shall be by candle, gas, electricity, or any other agent—unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works or objects as are already in progress.

Now, this rule has been liberally construed to enable us to provide in appropriation bills and appropriation laws for the public service where the letter of the law is silent. Given the right under the law to light the city of Washington, all means necessary to light it are necessarily implied, and are matters of detail, direction, or limitation. Gentlemen may ask, are there any precedents? Yes; I now read from the Digest:

A provision in the Navy appropriation bill for additional ships was held to be in order, as being in continuation of a public object already in progress, namely, the maintenance of the Navy.

There is no battle ship or cruiser that has been constructed in the last ten years but what has been authorized and its construction begotten upon an appropriation bill under the rule and under the rulings. Gentlemen understand that ordinarily a public building can not be built until first an act authorizing the construction of the public building has been enacted. Then for the first time it is in order to appropriate. Yet I find the following decision. The Chair well knows that under general provisions of law we have a military academy in the State of New York.

In the Military Academy appropriation bill a provision for a fire-proof building on the site of the public grounds at West Point is within the purview of the rule. The construction of a building is an incident to the maintenance of the academy itself, the object being already in progress, the main object contemplated not only by the bill but by the very institution of the academy itself.

That was the decision of Mr. Cox, late a Representative from the State of New York. Here is the character of the decision: That you can not appropriate under the rule for a public building in the city of New York or in the city of Utica until a law shall first be enacted authorizing it. It is true an appropriation for such a building without authorization would not be in order upon an appropriation bill; but in the case given, the law establishing the academy at West Point, the buildings followed as a necessary incident. So here the law places the District of Columbia under the direction of Congress; the lighting of the public streets and parks is under the law, and it is idle to say that a provision as to how they shall be lighted is subject to a point of order, because such provision is absolutely essential as a necessary incident to the lighting itself.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Under the existing law there is a company, is there not, which has the right to light the streets of Washington?

Mr. CANNON. No.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is there not a company that is now doing that lighting under existing law?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; under the existing appropriation there is a company which lights the streets and parks for the current fiscal year.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Now, is it not proposed by this amendment that other companies than that one may come in and lay down their conduits in the streets, and if they do so, will they not do it under this proposed law and not under any other law?

Mr. CANNON. If somebody, either an individual or a corporation, is a lower bidder than the existing company for lighting the streets and the parks of this city, under the appropriation proposed in this bill, and that individual or corporation is without means or appliances to deliver the gas along the line of the streets and in the public parks, it is proposed by this bill that the District Commissioners may permit that individual or corporation to lay down mains for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of lighting the public streets and parks.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is there any existing law that would authorize the Commissioners to give authority to any other company to lay mains for the purpose of lighting the streets and parks?

Mr. CANNON. I understand not. But it appears to me from his question that the gentleman fails to understand my position. It is this: In pursuance of existing law, for a municipal purpose, it is competent for Congress to appropriate money to light the public streets. That being the case, by limitation, by license, we can direct how the money shall be expended to effect the object in view, namely, the lighting of the streets, and we can, within Rule XXII, if necessary for the purpose of lighting the streets, authorize the planting of posts and the hanging of lanterns upon them, or the erection of posts for lamps, or the stringing of wires and the laying of conduits and of gas mains, or whatever else is necessary as incident to the public lighting for which we appropriate this money. Whatever is necessary for carrying out the work for which the appropriation is made may be authorized in connection with the appropriation giving authority for the expenditure of the money. Otherwise we could not light at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the purpose of this provision in the bill to be to open to public competition the lighting of the District by either electricity or gas, and that inasmuch as there is to-day a practical monopoly of gas lighting and electric lighting here, the Commissioners are authorized, in case a lower bid is presented, to permit the bidders to establish an underground system for their gas lighting or their electric lighting.

Now, it is obvious that, so far as gas is concerned, the time for that form of lighting in municipalities is about expiring. Gas in future will be used mainly for heating and for power, and not for lighting. The light of the future is the electric light; and I wish to make a suggestion to the Committee on Appropriations with reference to that subject, for doubtless it will be further considered in conference when this bill shall have been reported from the Senate.

The question is this: We have within reach of Washington, only 14 miles distant, the Great Falls of the Potomac, now partially owned by the Government. The Potomac at that point is the source of our present water supply. I am told that the District Commissioners wish to secure control of the entire Great Falls, and that that power is one of the most efficient in all this Eastern country, standing second only to Niagara. Now, it seems to me that this is the time, while electric lighting is in its infancy and while no corporation of that kind has yet any very large vested right in this community, to determine the question whether the municipality itself shall not own an electric-lighting plant and whether it can not operate such a plant in connection with its water system to the great advantage of the District and with great economy to the taxpayers.

I am quite sure that the District Commissioners, if they are given authority, will inaugurate a system of electric lighting vastly superior to any that would be provided by a private corporation under the provisions of this bill, for I take it that no private corporation will invest any large amount of money in an efficient system of lighting with the threat hanging over its head, as provided in this bill, that Congress may, whenever it sees fit, forfeit the right; in other words, that the privilege of using the streets may be taken away while the property invested in the improvement still remains there. It seems to me that the wise, the rational, the prudent solution of this question is to take the District Commissioners into the confidence of Congress with reference to this matter and devise a system of municipal lighting by electricity, and not to provide for the destruction of the streets of Washington by giving the Commissioners power to grant to some new corporation, or to some individual, the right to lay down new gas mains and electric-light conduits.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment on the point of order, unless the Chair is ready to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, the language of clause 2 of Rule XXI has been so frequently referred to on the floor that it is hardly necessary to repeat it; yet I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the exact language of that provision:

> 2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this provision in the bill under consideration changes existing law, it is clearly obnoxious to the rule, unless it comes within the exception—

> Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works or objects as are already in progress.

What is the existing law in respect to gas and electric lighting? I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no existing law other than that found in the annual appropriation bills. In other words, there is no statute on the question. The statute invoked by the gentleman from New Hampshire, if strictly construed, would absolutely forbid the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from repairing the streets, because in order to do so they must to a certain extent make excavations in the streets.

I repeat, there is no existing statute in respect to this matter aside from that found in the current appropriation bills. That being the case, if the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Hampshire is a correct one, then it must lie against every line of this paragraph. If section 286, to which the gentleman refers, relates to this proviso, then not only the proviso, but the entire paragraph is obnoxious to the rule. I think the gentleman from New Jersey clearly demonstrated the fallacy of the position taken by the gentleman from New Hampshire in respect to the construction of the section referred to.

The case has also been so clearly stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] that it seems hardly necessary to add another word. This is a public object, and this House has repeatedly sustained decisions of Chairmen of Committees of the Whole to this effect. Old members will recall the original decision, made February 26, 1887, by Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, then and now a member of the House. In that case it was proposed to provide for the construction of some new ships for the Navy. The point of order was made that the provision for the new ships was in violation of the rule because not authorized by legislation.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole properly held that the construction of ships was in "continuation of a public object" already in progress—the maintenance of the Navy. Of course, if that had not been the ruling, no addition could be made to the Navy except by an independent, original statute. The gentleman from Kentucky in rendering that decision said:

> If the object is a public object, and is already in progress, then there need not be any previous legislation authorizing it.

So that we are brought to this conclusion at last: If the contention of the gentleman from New Hampshire and the gentleman from Iowa is correct, then this law in respect to gas and electric lighting is like "the laws of the Medes and Persians"; it must stand as originally placed in the appropriation bill. But, sir, the matter of gas and electric lighting are incidental to the operations of a great city. It is a necessary incident of the government of a city; and a provision such as that contained in this bill is not, in my judgment, in any manner obnoxious to clause 2 of Rule XXI.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not care on this question to go into a discussion of the rules and the precedents as to whether this is new legislation. But I can state to the Committee of the Whole a few facts from which they can draw their own conclusions.

There is now in preparation in this city a bill which proposes that the Government shall acquire the balance of the property at Great Falls, of which it now owns nearly all. By so doing it will control that enormous water power, of sufficient capacity to light the city of Washington with electricity. That measure will be brought before this House. We have pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia a bill to reduce the price of gas to $1 per thousand and to increase the illuminating power to 22 candles. We have also before us two bills asking for new charters to be granted in the regular way, each for a lighting and heating company.

Now, the gentlemen asking these charters are men of means, of capital and ability. If this bill passes, it will practically nullify all of such legislation, and it will be useless to report it from the committee to this House. Why? Because in the provision now pending here we propose to give anybody authority to bid for gas lighting or electric lighting in this city. Congress, by this provision, proposes to delegate the authority it has jealously guarded for many years to control this subject in the District of Columbia. All this authority it proposes to turn over to the Commissioners in this District and to permit anybody to come in here, whether responsible or not, and make bids for gas or electric lighting; and to the lowest bidder, whoever the party may be, the Commissioners can give authority to tear up the streets and put in new gas mains or wire conduits. The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] has very aptly spoken about the condition of our streets; but think what the streets of this city would be if we should enact into law any such provision as that now pending. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that this provision practically nullifies the legislation now pending before the Committee for the District of Columbia, and such being the case, it must necessarily be new legislation.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] have each referred to paragraph 2 of Rule XXI. But the gentleman from Illinois in no part of his remarks has referred to that portion of the clause under which this point is made.

He talked very eloquently about appropriations for public works, and objects "already in progress." I did not make any point of order at all under that clause. The decision he cited has no reference whatever to the point I made; and the same is true with regard to the decision cited by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. I am not talking concerning public works in progress; but after all the clauses in the rule they cited, there comes the grand overshadowing one of all, under which I made the objection, and that is this:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Now, I need say no more, except to inquire if this is not a change of existing law, in that it authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to do something that they would not for an instant entertain if not authorized by the proposed act. The section of the law I cited applies to every street and every alley in the District of Columbia, and while subsequent power has been given to the Commissioners by law, for appropriate objects, to grant permits to dig up the streets, they will not do it at the dictation of any irresponsible bidder who may come into the District with not a dollar's worth of ground or property here, nor having a dollar of interest in taxation. They have no authority so to do.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Well, Mr. Chairman, if they want to have a vote now, if they are satisfied with the question as it is, I am perfectly content. If not, I desire to say a few words on this subect. [Cries of "Go on!"]

It is perfectly plain to my mind—and I do not profess to be a lawyer, either—I do not think a man need to be one to understand the question; for it is not necessary either to be able to repeat the rule in Shelley's case, nor to quote the Pandects in order to see that the argument on this floor with reference to the pending subject is this—on one side it is contended, by the report brought in here by the Appropriations Committee, that this is not a change in the existing law, but that it is the institution of a rule or regulation to carry out existing law; and it seems to me that the statement is very clear, indeed, and I shall vote according to my understanding of the case. On the other hand, there is a demand made, not by a straight discussion of a legal point, but by the bringing in of extraneous arguments of a very comprehensive character, to carry the point of order against the report of the committee. We have been invited, and adroitly invited, to the contemplation of a rose-colored scheme about a water plant to be established up the Potomac, which is to furnish electricity and light to the city in coming time; and that we had better not pass any such section as that contemplated here, which might operate against that scheme, but wait until the good time shall come.

Now, the speeches that have been made here clearly show that we are not infracting any law, but simply making rules to carry it out, and I shall vote, Mr. Chairman, accordingly, believing this project to be for the best interest of all concerned.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the first ground of objection in Chairman DINGLEY'S ruling the other day read from the desk as a part of my remarks, as the reason for the rule I have invoked very briefly and concisely stated. It is only one of several, but it makes a strong suggestion in connection with the pending matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is a good ruling, but has no connection with this subject.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. That inasmuch as general appropriation bills carry the appropriations necessary to maintain the Government, and only appropriations already authorized by existing law, it is of the highest importance that they should not be impeded or jeopardized by differences in the House, or differences between the House and Senate, or differences between the two Houses and the Executive over any legislative propositions that may be proposed as amendments to such bills, each of which should be tried out on its own merits in separate bills.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I presume, after the very sensible remarks which the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS] has made, that no further suggestions are necessary with reference to the point of order. But of course it is important that we do not go wrong in this matter. I feel that I am almost willing to trust the Chair without further debate. But just a word respecting the matter and I will submit to the decision of the Chair.

They say this provision changes existing law. If it does, of course it ought to go out of the bill. But, let me ask, what law does it change? The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] read a statute which relates to the subject no more than the sermon on the mount. It is not even a sixteenth cousin to it. It refers wholly to malicious trespasses and misdemeanors and obstructions on the public highways of the District, without authority or color of it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is it not new legislation?

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman mistakes the language of the rule. The rule says that it "shall not change existing law." Let us hold to that language. It does not say "new legislation." It is new to this bill. Yes; this precise proposition, with all of its belongings, has not been proposed before, but that does not make it subject to the rule quoted by the gentleman.

But what other law is suggested as being contravened by this proposition? They cite the charter of the Washington Gas Light Company. Now, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] read from section 8 of the act incorporating that company, which is an old one, how it authorized the company to lay down pipes and to dig up the streets. Very well. Then he calls attention to a clause in section 9 which expressly provides that it shall not be construed to give this exclusive right to this corporation. If it had given exclusive right to do this to that corporation, then I grant, Mr. Chairman, that would be law which this provision would contravene; but that act of incorporation, in section 9, expressly withheld exclusive privilege. Now, what other law do they claim it changes? There has not been a word of suggestion as to any other law. That solves the whole problem. I feel that I need not further occupy the time of the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman inform us by what authority the Washington Gas Light Company is permitted to put its pipes under ground?

Mr. GROUT. By virtue of its charter.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then if some other corporation or individual were permitted, under an act of Congress, to lay its pipes under ground, would it not be a change of existing law?

Mr. GROUT. It would, if the exclusive right was given to the Washington Gas Light Company; but it was expressly reserved to the people by the enacting power, and may now be exercised, and in no way run against any provision in the Washington Gas Light Company's charter. It is a provision rightfully derived, as I suggested when upon the floor before, from the organic act conferring the right to appropriate the money necessary to correct, full, and complete municipal administration.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Can the Commissioners grant this permission to lay these pipes without this enactment?

Mr. GROUT. I think they could; I said so in the committee. I think if we were to provide that they should give us an underground service—this refers to the gas proposition, however—if we gave to a competing gas company the right to furnish lights, it would carry with it the implied right to put these gas pipes under ground, because it is the universal rule to do so. It would follow by implication. I think it was unnecessary to insert the specific recital of authority to the Commissioners to grant the privilege. I think it is fairly incidental to the power to appropriate, and any court would have so held. I suggested it to the gentleman who formulated the proposition, but I agreed with him that it could do no harm, because the right still exists.

Mr. FISCHER. If this provision was stricken from the bill, what method would be pursued in order to lay gas pipes?

Mr. GROUT. If a competing gas company should make a bid, and if they guaranteed by sufficient bond to the Commissioners that they would light the city, the Commissioners could give leave to that new company when organized—and it is said to be already in embryo—to open up the streets without a word from Congress, in my opinion, as an incident to their executive authority in administering the affairs of the District, because here is the appropriation of the money, and it can not be made effective without that incidental privilege—it is a mere incidental privilege.

Mr. FISCHER. That is the law as it is to-day?

Mr. GROUT. I think so.

Mr. FISCHER. Does not this change it?

Mr. GROUT. No; it only reasserts it. It only makes it more plain. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair is ready to rule. The provision in the bill against which the point of order is raised allows the private individual or corporation that may happen to be the lowest bidder for lighting the streets of the city to enter upon the streets and dig trenches and lay pipes, etc., for the purpose of supplying gas. Now, the Chair must assume that the streets of the city of Washington, like the streets of all other cities, are dedicated to the public for the public use in the ordinary way, for the passing and repassing of teams, vehicles, and the public, and not for the private use of entering upon the streets for the purpose of digging them up and laying gas pipes or anything of the kind by private individuals or corporations. In furtherance of that view of the Chair, we are cited to two sections of the statute which provide a penalty against the digging up or obstruction of the streets in any manner. This provision would allow a private corporation to obstruct the public traffic by digging up the streets and laying pipes. Therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, it is a change of existing law.

Now, it has been argued that this is an incident or a limitation on the appropriation that is made for the lighting of the streets. Of course these other provisions, against which the point of order is not raised, are not provisions of that kind. They limit the price per lamp or the price to be paid for a lamp which shall burn all night, and which shall not burn during moonlight, and other limitations of that character, and those provisions would not be subject to the point of order.

In the Fifty-first Congress, under this rule, a clause was inserted in the District of Columbia appropriation bill providing that after a certain time no electric light company should have wires stretched upon poles in the streets, a provision intended to compel electric light companies to use underground wire. This same point of order was raised against that provision, and the same contention was made that that was only a limitation upon the method of lighting the streets, and that therefore it was in order. But the Chair sustained the point of order in that case, although the amendment was offered in a different form; and therefore the Chair feels compelled in this case to sustain the point of order against this provision.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the section as it now stands.

Mr. CANNON. What goes out?

The CHAIRMAN. The last proviso, commencing at line 13.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order was made against the proviso before that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point was not made against that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I remember very distinctly that I made it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that no point of order was made against that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the remainder of the proviso and insert the following, commencing at line 10, striking out all that and inserting:

Provided further, That the District Commissioners are hereby invested with authority and are required to fix the price at which gas shall be furnished to consumers, including the District and the United States, at a price not to exceed $1 per thousand feet: And provided further, That said Commissioners are authorized to determine the candlepower of all gas to be consumed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. I raise the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa on the point of order.

Mr. PITNEY. I want to state the ground of my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PITNEY. The point of order was intended to be confined to this ground, Mr. Chairman: A former part of the bill, which has been passed by the committee, provides the rates for these gas lamps, which will be about 69 cents per thousand feet, and this proposed proviso would now authorize a rate of $1 per thousand feet. It is therefore obnoxious to the criticism that it renders the two parts of the section contradictory one of the other, and it ought not to be submitted in that form. I hope the gentleman will amend his motion.

Mr. HEPBURN. If that is the point of order, I will not make the argument I proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please send up his amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Supposing the point made against this amendment was similar to the one made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, I was only going to call attention to the argument that was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] a little while ago; and by the way, Mr. Chairman, I want to caution those gentlemen against too freely editing their speeches between now and to-morrow morning. I want all of those arguments to appear in the RECORD. [Laughter.] I want that speech of my friend from Illinois to be a veritable Banquo's ghost, to haunt him on a thousand occasions. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the amendment has not yet been stated from the desk, and we really do not know what it is.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is to strike out all after and including "Provided further," in line 10, page 16, and insert.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 10, strike out the words "Provided further," and insert—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Strike out how far?

Mr. HEPBURN. Strike out all in the paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What are the words to be stricken out?

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the entire service of gas lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is proposed to be stricken out?

The Clerk read as follows:

And insert the following:

"Provided, That the District Commissioners are hereby invested with authority and are required to fix the price at which gas shall be furnished to consumers, including the District and the United States, at a price not to exceed $1 per thousand feet: And provided further, That said Commissioners are authorized to determine the candlepower of all gas to be consumed in the District of Columbia."

Mr. PITNEY. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I raise the point of order that it changes existing law and therefore can not be inserted in a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa on the point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would be glad to know, if the gentleman will tell us, what law is changed by this amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, the very words in which it is offered show it is a change of existing law. When an amendment provides that certain officers "are hereby vested," the language presupposes that until that moment the power attempted to be conferred upon the officials was not vested in them.

Again, the amendment says that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are "hereby authorized," clearly implying that until that moment the Commissioners were not authorized to exercise any such power or function as that which is attempted to be conferred upon them by the amendment. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition is so clear that so good a lawyer as the gentleman from Iowa ought not to need any argument to convince him.

Mr. NORTHWAY. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is not your amendment the law now?

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] has just asserted that it is not. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will you not please answer my question: Is not your amendment the law now?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in saying that this amendment is obnoxious to a point of order. [Laughter.] I would not have had any doubt about it an hour ago, but I have listened to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and I confess that if the propositions laid down by those gentleman are correct the ideas that I had previously entertained have undergone a considerable change. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 10, page 16, strike out the words "Provided further, That the entire service of gaslighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please explain the object of his amendment?

Mr. MAHON. The proviso which I propose to strike out amounts to nothing, after the ruling of the Chair, because there is only one gas company here, and there is no one to compete.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is, the amendment reported by the committee having gone out on the point of order, there is confessedly only one gas company here that has power to enter upon the streets of the city, and therefore, to undertake to advertise for bids would be a mere farce. That is the gentleman's idea, as I understand him?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] says that "confessedly" there is no other company except the one in existence that has the right to lay down pipes. I would like to know who has confessed it.

A MEMBER. He has.

Mr. GROUT. Yes; that may be so. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may confess it, but certainly the ruling of the Chair does not make it so.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Do you claim——

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. GROUT. If you have, all right, but I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman had remembered the ground which I took on the point of order a moment ago, he would hardly have said it was "confessed" that there was no power left to take up the streets and lay down new mains. I expressly stated that in my opinion as a lawyer—I have not practiced lately, but I thought I did know something about law before I got into the midst of these demoralizing scenes [laughter]—I stated that in my opinion the power was in the Commissioners without this provision in the pending bill to grant that permit, and I think so still. Now, the proposition, after the ruling out of the provision that has just gone out on the point of order, is to strike from the bill this proviso which would leave the service open to competition.

It is stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] offering this amendment that there is no other company to compete, and the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] echoes that statement; while, on the other hand, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia says there is a new gas company about to be chartered, perhaps by a bill which will be presented here to-morrow. Very well; whether a new company be formed or not, this proviso in the bill does no harm. It really does good. I can understand very well why gentlemen are so restive when this gas problem is struck——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What is the reason?

Mr. GROUT. If gentlemen will make a comparison of the figures presented in this bill with the figures in the existing law, they will see that we have made here a very great reduction in the price of the gas which is to be furnished to the public—a very great reduction—and that accounts for all this bustle when a proposition like this is made. The gas company is hurt. I can not myself believe that it is out of pure devotion to the spirit of the law or from a wonderful admiration and deference for the rules of the House in their spirit as well as letter that gentlemen are prompted to raise points of order on the provision which has now gone out, and then to discourse learnedly with reference to the impossibility of executing this provision. If they will look at the figures reported in this bill, they will see it is provided that a lamp which before cost $20.50 shall now be furnished for $16, and that it shall be burned eight hundred and some odd hours per year more than under existing law. That is what this provision amounts to when you figure it out; and who will say that this does not account for the great care here displayed lest the rules of the House or the law in some way be violated? Now, unless you want to save, and I do not believe that this House or this Committee of the Whole does want to save——

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether any question has been raised in this discussion as to the price of gas? I do not understand that that question has been raised.

Mr. GROUT. We have not heard much about that.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understood from the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] that that question had been before the House. I do not understand that it has.

Mr. GROUT. It is before the House in this paragraph now under consideration.

Mr. BABCOCK. The prices, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, have met, I think, the approval of every member of the House, but when the committee went further and attempted to enact new legislation, that was a ground of objection.

Mr. GROUT. I can not yield for a speech. I yielded merely for a question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Was it not stated by the chairman of the committee that the District Commissioners had already attempted to reduce the price of gas furnished by the present company, but that the company had refused to comply with the demand of the Commissioners?

Mr. GROUT. I have not heard any such statement. If it has been made, gentlemen will remember it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It was made some time ago.

Mr. GROUT. To go back to the proposition I was upon; we provide a new schedule, which is no longer the "moon" schedule, but from forty-five minutes after dark to forty-five minutes before daylight, and at the same time make this reduction from $20.50 per lamp to $16 per lamp. I find that those gentlemen who make objection here are now ready to concede the provision as to price, but they evidently want to avoid the feature of competition. Sir, this bill has not yet been acted on by the Senate and returned from that body. In what shape it may come back here as to the price of gas no one knows.

But supposing this competition clause be removed, there are suits now pending in which it is contended that where a limit is fixed the meaning is that the whole amount fixed by the limit, and nothing less, shall be paid. Some lawyer has been so wise as to plant a suit upon that basis. Now, I believe that as the result of the competition here proposed, instead of getting these lamps for $16 apiece we are likely to get them for $10 apiece. They can be furnished at $10 apiece and money made upon them. Gentlemen say there is no company to compete. But surely if the company which my friend, the chairman of the District Committee, promises will soon be brought into being we shall then have competition.

It has been suggested that the municipality should own the gas plant and the electric plant, and that might be a wise thing to do. Let me state what has been the experience in the city of Philadelphia. There the city owns the gas works; and the streets and public buildings are lighted, and gas furnished to the citizens at $1 a thousand.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I am not opposed to the retention of this provision in the bill. I simply asked my colleague [Mr. MAHON] his purpose in offering it.

Mr. GROUT. I supposed the gentleman was urging reasons why the provision should be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. GROUT. If nobody objects, let us take a vote on the proposition.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment because there is only one gas company in the city of Washington. When the committee drew this section of the bill, they very properly put in the words which I now ask to have stricken out; but since, under the point of order, all the remainder of the clause has gone out, why allow these few words to remain, which will compel the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to advertise in the daily papers, at an expense of $600 or $700, inviting competition, when there can be no competition? If the committee want these words to remain in the bill, I do not care.

In reference to the residue of the bill, I did not intend to say anything. However, I have had some experience Mr. Chairman, in legislative bodies in my own State, where we would call a clause of this character in the pending bill a "snake." I have no reflection, of course, to make upon the gentlemen composing the committee, because I know that these gentlemen have brought this proposition in believing it to be the best for the people of the District and for the District itself. But if any gentleman will examine it for even a very few minutes, as we have another section immediately following this one of the same kind—if parties wish to obtain a large and valuable franchise in this city, let them come to Congress to ask for the franchise. The section just ruled out on the point of order, and another coming on immediately afterwards, gives to the three Commissioners of the District the right, within the next year, to give to any person—one man, two men, three men, or any number of individuals or any corporation in the United States—the right to come into the streets of this beautiful city to dig them all up and put in gas mains or electric wires and absolutely control the lighting of the city.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If it is in the interest of the taxpayers of the city to dig up, why not?

Mr. MAHON. When such a valuable franchise is asked for, let them come to Congress and ask it. Do not allow the Commissioners to give away this valuable franchise.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Could any better use be made of the streets than to make them available for the interests of the people?

Mr. MAHON (continuing). In Philadelphia they have been held by the throats by lighting corporations under somewhat similar circumstances.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not let the streets be dug up, if the citizens are to be benefited by the digging?

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman misapprehends my point. I am willing to give the right to anybody under proper circumstances and through the proper channels, but I am unwilling that it shall be at the option of these three Commissioners.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word more. I do not believe that the House should give any company the right to come and tear up the streets of this city. Your parks are in darkness. The magnificent park around this building is in darkness. Let the District authorities—let the Congress authorize the authorities of the District or some authority to erect a great electric plant; let the city or the District own it and furnish commercial light as other cities are doing, and put the revenues into the treasury of the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

But I repeat, that my objection is to putting in the hands of the Commissioners this valuable franchise. Do you not know that there are men in this country who would willingly pay $500,000 or $1,000,000 for a privilege that Congress proposes to give away absolutely without a dollar of compensation? You give me the authority to authorize four individuals or any number of individuals to come and get permission from the District Commissioners to put gas and electric mains through the streets and furnish light and heat to this city, and I will guarantee to get for you or for the District treasury a million dollars for the right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You had better do it then and apply the fund to paying off the District debt. We need the money badly.

Mr. MAHON. But they claim in extenuation that there is a proviso appended that this is only for one year, and that Congress at the end of the year may revoke the privilege and confiscate the property. But do you suppose, Mr. Chairman, that after a company had obtained this privilege and gone on and made its preparations, established its plant, torn up the streets, and put in its mains, that you are going to take possession of that property without compensation?

Now, I merely call the attention of the House to these matters. I have no reflection, I repeat, to make upon this committee and its members. I only call attention to this and the following section to show that you are passing a valuable franchise, worth a million, or rather you are putting it in the hands of three men to grant it, to do just as they please with it, without any return to the District.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. How much did the present electric light company and the gas company pay for the franchises they own, and which they exercise to the absolute exclusion of everybody else?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know.

Mr. WASHINGTON. They did not pay a dollar.

Mr. MAHON. You mean the gas company in this District—this city?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. No; I do not know what they paid.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Well, they got that franchise for nothing.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we can not complain of what was done in good old Democratic days. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. Well, if Congress has done foolish things in the past, it is time for it to stop now.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to have the attention of the committee for two or three minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me for a moment, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to a danger that might be involved in the existence of the proviso precisely as it reads, after the second proviso has gone out on the point of order.

Provided further, That the entire service of gaslighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor.

Supposing—and it is entirely possible—that but one company, the existing company, should bid, and that they should put in a bid of a dollar and a half a thousand, or more, do you propose to compel the Commissioners to accept that bid?

Mr. GROUT. No, and if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. DINGLEY. I merely called the attention of the gentleman to the matter.

Mr. GROUT. I think I can answer. If the gentleman will turn to the part of the bill above, where it reads that no more than $16 per annum for each street lamp shall be paid for gas, and so forth, he will find the necessary limitation on this clause, because the whole must be read together; but if the gentleman thinks that is insufficient, we have not the slightest objection to making it perfectly plain.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it would be well to do that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is timely, and it is well for the chairman of the committee to accept the amendment out of abundant caution. Now, then, the House is in this attitude in considering the proposition under discussion: A point of order has been invoked which has stricken down the provision authorizing a competing company to lay its pipes and mains. That proviso has gone out on a point of order.

Following this disaster comes the assault on the proposition for competition with the plausible plea that because there is an absence of authority (the point of order having been sustained) to lay gas mains, therefore the proviso authorizing competitive bids should be stricken from the bill. I congratulate gentlemen upon the adroitness and ability with which they have relentlessly pursued this paragraph of the pending bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire both sides of the House to understand clearly the issue here, not only in respect to this paragraph, but also the one which follows, relating to electric lighting. A point of order will also be employed to prevent the grant of authority to a competing electric company to lay down its wires. Following that point of order there will doubtless be a motion to strike from that paragraph any authorization of competition. So that, gentlemen, we are face to face with this situation: These companies to-day, under seeming authority of law, exercise the sinister privileges of monopoly.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. In just a moment; and because a company has recently had the temerity, under a charter from the State of West Virginia, to enter this District to compete with the existing electric light company, it is plied with injunctions now "three deep" in the courts, the United States Electric Light Company claiming that it has the sole privilege of lighting the city with electricity. Now, let us understand the contention. I concede there is some force in the suggestion of gentlemen who oppose granting new charters. I admit their sincerity when they insist that it is sound public policy to control these corporations by regulating rates of compensation rather than by the authorization of competition.

Our position, Mr. Chairman, is this: We would regulate both as to rates by express provision of law, and also by inviting that wholesome competition which exists or should exist everywhere. Now, unless gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber—for this is a question not clouded with partisan considerations—are willing that the gas and electric light companies shall continue to exercise an unchallenged monopoly, they ought to leave these provisos in the bill, amended as suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], and then let us go to the Senate and fight out this battle with the Senate for cheaper gas and cheaper electric lights in the national capital. This is the issue. [Loud applause.]

If you strike out the proviso on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania there will not remain a "peg" upon which to hang a proposition for a fair and just compromise with the body at the other end of the Capitol. Gentlemen talk about tearing up the streets. Mr. Chairman, if it is necessary to dig up the streets in order to dig up monopolies, then I say dig up the streets of the city of Washington. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, we are indebted to the advent in this city of a new electric light company for the fact that this bill carries a reduction of the cost of electric lighting from 40 cents to 28 cents per night.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILES. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was saying that the reason why we have secured this large reduction in the cost of electric lighting is due to the existence of the new competitor for electric-light service which has recently entered the District of Columbia and is clamoring to-day at the doors of Congress for recognition. Not for a monopoly, Mr. Chairman, but the single privilege of entering the field of open, honorable competition for the service for which you appropriate the money of the people of the District and of the people of the United States.

Gentlemen say we can not secure competition. I violate no confidence when I say that within the last sixty minutes I have had a conversation with a distinguished citizen of my own State, formerly a member of this House, in which he recited the history of the contest of the people of Kansas City in their efforts to reduce the cost of gas in that city. A little more than thirty years ago, as I remember from the memorandum I made, there was granted by the city council of Kansas City to M. J. Payne and others the exclusive franchise for the privilege of gaslighting in Kansas City. The charter did not terminate at the end of the thirty years, but within that time the gas company had an exclusive monopoly of gaslighting in that city.

At the end of thirty years the common council of Kansas City passed an ordinance reducing the cost of gas from $1.60, as it was then—the price had varied, sometimes higher—to $1 a thousand. The company which had for thirty years enjoyed the monopoly of gas lighting, invoked the aid of the courts and insisted that the city council had no warrant of law for the reduction from $1.60 to $1 a thousand. The contention of the company was not sustained by the courts. A new company was chartered, and after the appearance of that company upon the field of business operations in Kansas City there was a gradual reduction in price until this time. Under the original company gas had never cost the citizens less than $1.60 per thousand. Now the rate has been reduced to 50 cents per thousand.

Now, I know, Mr. Chairman, that excessive competition sometimes operates unfavorably; but I appeal to members of this House to recall their own experiences. In private business the law never shields individuals with the armor of a monopoly. They never have or enjoy exclusive privileges. If engaged in farming there is no monopoly. If engaged in the practice of law there is competition. If pursuing the practice of medicine there is an open field and honorable competition. Mr. Chairman, in the vast scope of private enterprise the law never intervenes to grant exclusive privileges. Shall the power of this House be invoked in the splendid capital of our country in behalf of either a gas or an electric light monopoly? I do not believe this House will permit it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I am just as much in favor of active competition in lighting the streets of Washington as my friends upon the other side. If this amendment offered by my colleague from Pennsylvania will in any shape or form add an obstacle to competition, I am sincerely opposed to it. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it will do any harm to allow the bill to stand with the proviso in it directing the Commissioners to advertise for bids.

Mr. Chairman, we are assured by a gentleman who represents the Committee of the District of Columbia that that committee already has under consideration the chartering of companies to compete for the contract of furnishing gas to this city. I had the honor to introduce a bill that is pending before that committee, and, in speaking in behalf of the people for whom I introduced that bill, I will say that they are amply responsible and abundantly able to perform all their undertakings, and they may insert in that charter a proviso to furnish gas to the citizens of Washington at the sum of 50 cents a thousand, and they will accept that; and of the $122,000 appropriated by this bill, two-thirds of it may be saved if we can get this competition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply arose to say that when the gentleman from Missouri addresses his remarks to this side of the House, assuming that we are in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think he is wrong in his assumption. I do not think the gentleman himself cares to insist upon his amendment. If the proposition in the bill as it now stands, as it now appears, will in any way, shape, or form authorize the Commissioners to invite competition, let us let it alone. I do not see for myself, if the point of order was sustained, how any company not having legal rights to enter upon the streets can possibly be given that right by replying or bidding in response to the advertisement; but let it remain if anybody thinks it can.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I, with the balance of the members of the House, was delighted to hear the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. I welcome him into the ranks of the antimonopolists. Year after year, Mr. Chairman, for the last fifteen years there have been contests in this House over this question of the reduction of the price of gas, and up to this time, that is, when these propositions were pending, when something might possibly be done, the gentleman waits until everything has gone out of the bill looking like control, and then floods the House with his oratory upon this question.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will allow me to say that I addressed an argument to the Chairman on the point of order. It seems, however, to have been ineffective.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, year after year we have had this contest, and I have never on any previous occasion seen the lance of the gentleman from Missouri put in rest against monopolies of this kind. I remember, sir, that at the last session some of us succeeded in having a bill passed by this House limiting the price of gas, exercising the power that the Congress clearly has with regard to this local gas company; but the gentleman from Missouri was not a participant in that contest.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that the Committee on Appropriations, I having charge of the bill, reported the existing law, which made a pronounced reduction in the rate theretofore paid for gas and electric lights.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, yes; a pronounced reduction in behalf of the Government, leaving the gas company free range to prey upon the people and make reprisals upon their private patrons. Is that hostility to monopoly?

Mr. Chairman, we have the power to control this company. Control of that kind is, to my mind, infinitely better than the questionable benefits that may come from competition. Competition does not always accomplish the results desired. In fact, sir, competition often precludes that which is sought to be accomplished and which might be accomplished in another way.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me get through with this idea, and then I shall be glad to listen to the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, what is it that we desire to do by competition? It is to lower the price of gas. Will we accomplish that by dividing the business and doubling the capital invested in carrying it on? Surely not. Clearly the better plan is to let one party have all the business, but to compel that corporation to do the business at a fair price. That is the sensible course for us to pursue.

I repeat, we have absolute control over this subject. This Congress can fix the rate. The corporation is bound to accept the rate that Congress fixes not only as to the gas used by the Government, but that used by all consumers. Is it not infinitely better that we should fix a fair rate than that we should invite another party to come in to tear up our streets, keep them in disorder for months, divide the business of supplying gas to this city between the new corporation and the old one, and, by that very means, make it necessary to double the capital invested, while the business is cut in two? Is it not unwise to expect, or to seek to obtain by such means, the low rates which otherwise we can command and compel?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the idea of control and the right to control being taken for granted, how low does the gentleman from Iowa propose to put the price of gas to the citizens of Washington? Where is his amendment?

Mr. HEPBURN. It was proposed in the act that we passed last year to put it at not more than $1 per 1,000 feet to all consumers, public and private.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But this competition proposes to put it at 60 cents a thousand feet to the citizens. Are you willing to go as low as that?

Mr. HEPBURN. In the amendment here it is proposed to fix it at a sum not to exceed $1 per thousand, and that is the rate that is fixed in this bill. The exact limit of the rate I would put within the control of the Commissioners, or of some power that knows what it ought to be, for I confess that I do not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Are you willing to put it at 50 cents per thousand feet to the citizens?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would be willing to do so.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, offer that amendment, and then we will believe that you are willing to practice what you preach. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on this subject, but I will waive it for the present and move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5210, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FENTON, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MOZLEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. FISCHER, for three days, on account of important business.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 p. m., the Speaker announcing that Mr. PAYNE would preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. PAYNE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar under the special order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57.

Mr. TALBERT. There is no quorum present, Mr. Speaker. I do not propose to make the point of no quorum, however, but merely to draw the attention of the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The negative vote has not yet been taken. Those who are opposed will rise and stand until counted.

There were no votes in the negative.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not do this with the intention of making the point of no quorum, but merely to call attention to the fact that it would be very much better to legislate with a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the ayes are 57, and the noes none. The motion is agreed to, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will please take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business under the special order. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Private Calendar.

SUSAN D. WRIGHT.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan D. Wright, former widow of James W. Wells, late a private in Company I, Tenth New York Volunteer Cavalry.

An amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Lines 4 and 5, strike out "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert "at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill was pending at the adjournment a week ago, and the report was then read, but it can be read again by unanimous consent.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question for information. Is not this the bill that we left off with at last Friday evening's session?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be the same bill. If there be no objection, the report will be again read.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright, have duly considered the same, and report as follows:

It appears from the evidence submitted to the committee, that Susan D. Wright, prior to her marriage to one Artemus Wright, was the widow of James W. Wells, of Company I, of the Tenth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, who died April 27, 1864. As such widow she was placed upon the pension roll of the United States and was in receipt of a pension, under certificate No. 44793, from the date of her first husband's death to the 4th day of March, 1872.

On the 9th day of March, 1872, said Susan D. Wright (then Wells) was remarried to Artemus Wright and has since drawn no pension, and her name has been dropped from the pension roll of the United States.

On the 25th day of May, 1894, said Artemus Wright died at Middlebury, in the State of Connecticut, and said Susan D. Wright again became and now is a widow.

Said Susan D. Wright is in indigent circumstances and in poor health, having no means of support except her daily labor. She is now 61 years of age, and by reason of age and feeble health is unable to do hard work.

Having carefully considered the bill, and in view of the foregoing facts, your committee recommend that the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," in lines 4 and 5, be stricken out, and the words "at the rate of $12 per month" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that, as so amended, the bill do pass.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the bill which is now before the House. Last Friday evening I was absent, but in looking at the RECORD I see that this bill was very generally discussed, and I suppose the facts were brought to the attention of the House. Possibly, however, there are some gentlemen here who were not present that evening, and I desire very briefly to direct attention to the main points in the case, and then to ask the favorable action of the House upon it.

Mrs. Wright married the soldier Wells and was his wife during the war. He died leaving her a young woman, under 30 years of age. Some six years later, being in indigent circumstances and a woman perhaps 35 years old, she had an offer to contract an eligible alliance. She married Mr. Wright and lived with him as his wife until his death. During the period of her married life the Government of the United States was saved from the payment of the pension which would otherwise have been given her. Having no means left her by her late husband, as she had none left her by the former one, she is in indigent circumstances. That she was a true and faithful wife to the soldier is unquestioned.

Now the question comes up for the consideration of this House—and I have had no intention to disguise the real issue—whether or not the Government of the United States shall continue its supervision and care over those who were at any time wives of her soldiers—those who were faithful in the marital relations—whether after that relation has ended they are to be placed on the pension roll. I say that such a policy is in accordance with what was adopted many years ago in the cases of those who were engaged in the war out of which grew this nation. There were given pensions to those who married the survivors of that war; and we have to-day on the pension rolls women who, marrying in their teens venerable soldiers of the Revolution, protected and nursed them during their lives. The Government, in placing such women upon the pension rolls, set the example of a beneficent policy to be observed in subsequent years.

This woman, if her application receives the approval of Congress, will receive only the same treatment which has been accorded in similar cases in the war of the Revolution. In passing this bill we simply follow what has been the practice in previous Congresses during which I have had the honor of a seat on this floor. I have voted for such bills. The two Congresses preceding this have passed such bills. There are now upon the pension rolls cases similar in character to that now presented.

This is a plain question. It should be brought to a vote without unreasonable delay. In view of the statements which have been made, I doubt whether there is any desire for further argument either for or against the bill. The question having been fully discussed, I hope members will be willing to come to a direct vote on this measure without delay.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that every word which has been spoken by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] is true. I have great respect for anything he may say on this floor. But, sir, on last Friday night there was a pension granted here to a lady who was only the sister of a dead soldier. The pension was granted in violation of all law and all principle. And now here we have an application to pension a lady who, having once drawn a pension as the widow of a soldier, chose after his death to remarry, thereby voluntarily relinquishing her claim upon the Government for a pension.

Mr. Chairman, there is a principle involved in this bill. There is, I hope, no prejudice or partisanship in the heart of any person on this floor, and I trust no such feeling will enter into the discussion of these pension claims. They should be decided without reference to any such influences. We should treat these pension claims as business men, looking upon them as business propositions. And we should pass these claims only when they are based upon law and principle, upon right and justice. I dare say, sir, that every old soldier, every old soldier's widow, all old soldiers' children, if justly entitled to a pension, will receive it under the pension laws of the United States, which are liberal and just and right.

Now, knowing the liberality of the gentleman from New York, and in view of the fact that this bill has already caused some friction, and may possibly continue to excite objection, I ask the gentleman from New York whether he will not allow it to lie over with an unfavorable report or let it take its place at the bottom of the Calendar? I ask the gentleman to pursue this course in order that other claims, more meritorious, based upon principle, upon justice, upon law, may come up and receive favorable action. I ask that this bone of contention be taken out of the way at the beginning of these Friday night sessions. Let us go on and do justice to all those to whom justice is due. I ask the gentleman from New York whether, in view of all the circumstances, he will not allow this claim to be laid aside with an unfavorable recommendation, as it ought to be?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. In reply to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], who has made frequent references to the law on the subject of pensions, I wish to say that there is no general law under which this woman can get a pension. If we succeed in the passage of this bill we establish a special law in her case.

Mr. TALBERT. Does the gentleman want her to get a pension outside of all law—illegally, unrighteously, unjustly—without regard to principle?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Allow me to answer. These Friday night sessions are held for the purpose of passing bills in such cases as are not covered by the general law. This is one of those cases.

Mr. MILES. The point made by my friend from South Carolina, as I understand, is that the pension proposed to be granted by this bill is in contravention of the general law now on the statute books.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I know that; I am so stating. I recognize that fact; and I want my friend from South Carolina to recognize it. But for the fact that these cases are outside of the general law, we should have no Friday night sessions.

If the general law covered all these cases, of course this special legislation would not be necessary. The only trouble is that there is no such general law, and therefore special exceptions in meritorious cases must be made. There is not a bill that passes the House of this character that is not in "contravention," to use my friend's language, of the general law. It is only because the general law does not cover these specific cases that Congressional action must be invoked.

Mr. MILES. But the contention of the gentleman from South Carolina is that the general law expressly provides against such a pension as this.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman from New York allow me an interruption?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that there is a very large number of widows in the same condition as the one which this bill is framed to relieve?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Well, I can only answer my friend by saying that my acquaintance with widows is not very extensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEREDITH. I presume the gentleman is taking old Weller's advice to beware of the widows.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. LITTLE. I regret that the gentleman finds it necessary to defend himself before any charge is made.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No; it is not that; it is only my regret that I am not able to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. LITTLE. But seriously, I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think that in the course of pension affairs there must be many just such cases? Now, if Congress takes the step which the gentleman proposes to take in this case, does he not think that it would be only an act of justice, if it is proposed to take this action at all, to make provision by a general law for all cases of this character?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think it would be very well to pass a general law; but pending the passage of a general law I believe it is desirable to consider these meritorious cases.

Mr. LITTLE. The truth is, that there must be very many cases of this character, people who are in the same condition as this woman; and it would seem, if the House is determined to pass a bill of this character, that it would be simply an act of justice, and avoid the appearance of discrimination, to make provision under a general law for the whole of them. I have no doubt that the other side of the House has ample courage about this question, whether they have a quorum or not; and I would suggest to the gentleman that it would be better some general legislation should be had upon the subject if any is to be had.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Well, we are only attempting to do justice, in individual cases, in the absence of a general law. If Congress passes a general bill, of course it will do away with the necessity for this special legislation. I believe it just and proper to do so myself; and I hope my friend, if he believes it to be just, will vote in favor of the bill. But I do not think it desirable to withdraw it, as suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina. It is better now, at the very threshold of this business, to settle the policy that is to be adopted.

Mr. TALBERT. I only wanted to suggest to my friend that he might probably put a block or obstacle in the way of the passage of other meritorious claims. I do not think the gentleman from New York wants to do that.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think the House fully understands the bill, and we are ready now to vote upon it. It has been well discussed, and I hope I will not be considered as unkind to my friends if I ask consent now to close the debate.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the Fifty-third Congress I had occasion frequently to submit minority reports upon a similar class of cases, and I send up one that I have resurrected from the RECORD of the last session, in order that the Clerk may read it in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The minority have expressed their views in this class of cases in report 601 on the bill 2908, to pension Martha E. Miller. That statement is equally applicable to this case, and is as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to restore her to the pension roll the same as if she were still the widow of the soldier whose name she voluntarily surrendered years ago.

To pass this bill is to nullify for the benefit of this one individual the substantial limitation of the general laws that the pension of soldiers' widows who have remarried shall cease.

The objections to be urged against such bills as this are numerous. In the first place, it makes an exception of a case which is in no wise exceptional. There may be varying degrees of destitution in different cases, but it may be fairly stated that all cases of widows who have remarried and again become husbandless, by reason of death or divorce, present the same substantial conditions.

If any widow so situated should be restored to pension, all widows so situated should be restored, and this by general enactment and not by individual private bills, whereby those who may happen to have a friend to espouse their cause secure a benefit which the modest and the unknown never think of seeking. Special pension acts are justifiable only in cases which are essentially exceptional and should not be used to grant to one that which is denied to the many whose situation is precisely the same. But aside from this consideration, however, the soldier's widow who remarries voluntarily relinquishes her pension because she prefers to do so.

The Government can not become an insurer against an unfortunate termination of this second matrimonial venture either by divorce or death. To restore pension in case of divorce is to encourage remarried widows to seek divorces, and, in any event, it is to give them an ostensible claim upon the soldier's death and memory which they have long since renounced by preference.

Furthermore, it is not to be assumed that legislation of this character is in the line of justice or of honor to the soldiers themselves, or that it is necessarily desired or favored by the soldier classes. A contribution from the public Treasury to the support of the widow of the soldier, so long as she remains his widow, every soldier, perhaps, desires, and the common consent of the nation for thirty years has sanctioned this; but that each soldier looks forward to and desires that his services and his memory shall be the basis of a pension to his wife at some remote day, beyond an intervening period of matrimonial alliance with some other husband, is by no means self-evident or fairly to be presumed.

Mr. ERDMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that report contains in condensed form the argument against this bill. I have not seen or heard anything since to change my views as expressed at that time.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ERDMAN. There is a great deal of maudlin sentiment expressed, but no sound argument that I have listened to. We have recently established another kind of widow. We have the remarried widow, the divorced widow, and by a bill passed a day or two ago we have a widow with a presumed living husband. I am opposed to any further legislation of this kind, unless it be by a general law, as stated in that report.

I appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] to let this bill be laid aside, because what was done in the last session in regard to bills of this character will, while I am here, be done in this session. I propose to have a quorum to say that this bill shall become a law before it can become a law. There was one bill of this character enacted into law in the Fifty-third Congress, and only one, and that was an accident. While I am here I shall want a quorum to pass upon any such bills, and I beg the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, one week ago to-night I felt it to be my duty to oppose this bill. I gave such arguments in opposition to it as at the moment I was able to suggest. I have thought of the matter very much during the last week, and I have interviewed very many old soldiers upon this question, both officers and privates. I have interviewed many of those who are as earnest and faithful members of the Grand Army of the Republic as there are in this city. I have not found one man who gave this bill his hearty support, and only one man who gave it even a partial support. They were all opposed to this class of legislation. I do not know that there can be any stronger or more earnest argument against the bill than such a statement and such testimony as that.

Mr. GARDNER. Did you interview the wives of these soldiers, and get their opinions?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In matters of legislation I am not accustomed to go beyond what is known as the head of the family.

Mr. GARDNER. The persons whose opinions I think we should take are those who are affected.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] said this is not new legislation, if I understood his words correctly, and he gave us a general statement about the pensioning of the widows of the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812; but he can not point us to a single instance where a remarried woman of such a soldier has ever been granted a pension.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Do you mean in respect to the last war?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am speaking now of the Revolutionary war and of the war of 1812.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I did not speak of the war of 1812, but every widow of a soldier of the Revolution was granted a pension, and I have been informed by those who have made a careful examination of the rolls that the pensions have been continued where the widows married and again became widows. Certainly, in respect to the war of 1861–1865, I have known of bills of this character to pass in former Congresses.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman has in no wise contradicted the statement which I made. Now, to come down to the war of 1861–1865. I have made something of a study of these pensions, and I know of only two cases where pensions similar to that asked for in the pending bill have ever been allowed. Both of those were in the closing days of the last session of the last Congress.

It would not matter even if there were more. The principle, to my mind, is entirely wrong. It is a principle which I do not think the people of this country will sustain. I do not believe that gentlemen on this side of the House can afford to place themselves upon record as sustaining such a principle. I do not believe that it is good policy politically or as a nation, upon grounds of patriotism or of honor.

The gentleman upon the other side said that this bill, if passed, would be in contravention of law. That statement is accurate. The existing law absolutely and unconditionally prohibits such pensions, and in that respect this bill differs from the legislation which we are usually called upon to enact on Friday evenings, for that is not in contravention of law, but in aid of law, and there is a vast difference between the two.

We must for a moment at least consider what we are doing if we pass such legislation as this. Already word of it has gone out throughout the land, and this bill is only the forerunner of a hundred thousand others. I have in my pocket a letter from a lady in some obscure town in Indiana that I never heard of until I got her letter.

Mr. HARDY. We have no obscure towns in Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It was from a town that in my ignorance I never heard of until I received her letter, and she, strange to say, had heard of the discussion here a week ago to-night, and said that she believed she ought to have a pension, although she was a remarried widow, and cited me two cases where it had been already granted, and said she wanted her bill passed just as soon as we got through the other one.

Now, following exactly that same proposition from Maine to California, and from the lakes to the Gulf, you can easily see what this bill will lead to. It will add a million to the pension roll. It has neither justice nor equity. It is not law. It has something of maudlin sympathy attached to it—nothing more; and I hope the gentlemen of this House will not put themselves on record in any such way as this bill provides.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Will my friend give way for a moment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. And permit me to read the law on the subject, for your information, which I was not able to give a few moments ago. I read section 4743 of the Revised Statutes, approved July 1, 1848:

In all cases where a pension has been granted to any officer or soldier of the Revolution in his lifetime, the evidence upon which such pension was granted shall be conclusive of the service of such officer or soldier in the application of any widow or any woman who may have been the widow of such officer or soldier to a pension; and upon proof by her that she was married to any such officer or soldier, and that she is a widow, that she shall thereupon be placed upon the pension roll at the same rate that such officer or soldier received during his lifetime.

I am now ready for the apology of my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. What are you reading from?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am reading from the statutes of the United States, in support of what I stated upon the floor upon information derived from a gentleman whom I know to be well informed upon this question. I was not able to give the language at the time I made the statement that in case the widow of a soldier of the Revolution should remarry and again become a widow she should be placed upon the pension rolls.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. What is the date of that statute?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It is section 4743 of the Revised Statutes, and the act was approved July 1, 1848.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. However that may be——

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman desire to address the committee again? I doubt whether he is in order, but I shall not object.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will inform the chairman of the committee that I never have resumed my seat or given up the floor, but yielded to the gentleman from New York, and if the gentleman will possess his soul in patience a little while we will get to this question.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not impatient.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Very well. It may be true that late in years, nearly a century after the war of the Revolution, by some ill-considered legislation, that has been granted. I take it that near a hundred years after the war, when the number of those widows may have been reduced to fifty, no one would object to such kindly consideration for them. But certainly to take the number and the proportion of those who were engaged in the late war, instead of it being fifty there will be ten thousand. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa for a question.

Mr. LACEY. Would you not make a difference in a case like this, where the widow was the wife of the soldier during the war, where she remained at home and farmed and took care of the family while he was at the front, and was killed in battle? Would you not consider that the service of her husband under those circumstances entitled her to the pension, even though eight years after the death of her first husband she married again and lost her second husband? Do not such circumstances make a peculiar case and take it out of the ordinary rule?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, it does take it out of the usual category, and does add to the merit of the case, but it does not change its legal aspect. There are undoubtedly strong features in favor of the pending bill that will not come to the support of most of the bills that will be offered in pursuance of precedent of this bill. I will go to the extent which the gentleman's question implies; that is, of giving special consideration to all widows who married prior to the war and during the war, and even within five years after the war; but, as I said here last Friday night, I do not believe that a widow who marries an old soldier now has any right or justification for receiving a pension at all.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Does not the gentleman know that even under the law of 1890 the woman must have been married to the soldier previous to June 27, 1890, in order to be entitled to a pension? We are not seeking here to pension women who marry soldiers at this late day, and none of the laws apply to such cases.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am perfectly well aware of the limitation in the act of 1890, but there is no limitation under the general statutes. Therefore, in relation to a very large number of all the claimants there is not any limitation, and a woman who married an old soldier thirty years after the war is just as much entitled to a pension under the law upon his decease as though she had been his widow during the war or during the whole intervening time. I do not think that is right. I think a limitation should be put on the general law as well as upon the other, and that it should even antedate 1890.

Now, as to the pending bill, it is necessary that we should consider the case not alone with reference to this lady, but as determining the general principle, and upon that general principle I am opposed to this bill, and believe that it should not receive the sanction of even a minority of this body. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PICKLER. I will detain the committee but a moment. Each of these cases brought up at these Friday evening sessions stands upon its own merits, and it is not the fact, as the gentleman from New Hampshire says, that each of these bills constitutes a precedent for all other bills. The whole matter resolves itself into this, gentlemen——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions whether there are any other bills of this character reported from the committee?

Mr. PICKLER. I think there is one more. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that the matter resolves itself into this: Whether these widows, even widows like this one, now in their old age, none of them under 60—this one, I believe, is 61, and most of them are 60, 70, or even 75, as their cases appear before our committee, and nearly all in indigent circumstances—whether we shall place them, as former Congresses placed the widows of the soldiers of the Revolutionary war, upon the pension roll, or whether we will send them to the poorhouse. That is the only question. Shall we treat them as the widows of the soldiers of other wars were treated by other Congresses when this nation was not one tithe as able as it is now to pay pensions, or shall we let them go to the poorhouse? Shall we show our appreciation of their merits, of their services to their soldier husbands, when they stayed at home and took care of the children, and cultivated the land, and helped to sustain the soldier fighting for his country, or shall we turn our backs upon them and let them become paupers? That, I repeat, is the only question.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, the remark which the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. PICKLER] has just made causes me to rise at this time to ask him a question. The gentleman said just a moment ago that this bill, if passed, would not be considered as a precedent. Now, sir, if that be true, it furnishes the best reason in the world why this bill should not pass. I take it that there is not a member of this House who has not a number of cases like this, and if the passage of this bill is not to be a precedent, then we are notified by the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee that we need not bring in our bills in cases like this and expect to have them passed upon favorably.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Ohio can not fairly construe my language in that way. I said that each of these cases considered at Friday evening sessions stood upon its own merits, but I did not say that no other case than this would be reported favorably by the committee. I am in favor of a general bill, applicable to all these cases, and the committee, even in the last Congress with its Democratic complexion, brought in a general bill to provide for all these widows, yet it appears that now we are not willing to treat these poor women as fairly and liberally as our fathers treated the widows of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. HULICK. In answer to that, I wish to say that I think we ought to act upon this subject considerately. Now, I have written to widows of this class in my district that their cases would not be considered on special bills; that the law was against them, but that a general act would doubtless be passed by this Congress providing for all such cases. I am in favor of such a general law, and the discussion this evening would apply very well to a general bill proposing to place upon the pension roll every widow of a soldier who had remarried and then become a widow.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is there peculiar in this case? There is certainly no peculiar hardship in it. This lady was a widow for eight years. During that time she drew a pension. She then married and remained a married woman for thirty years——

Mr. MAHON. And during that time she saved the Government $1,820.

Mr. HULICK. Certainly, and I think that is a good argument why a general law should be passed. This lady has been a widow now for not quite two years. I shall vote for this bill, but at the same time it raises this general question which we have to face: Are we to have all the widows who have remarried and then again become widows, in my district, and in every district in the country, pensioned by special act? If that is to be the policy of this Congress, then we must bring all those cases in here. If this were the only widow in like circumstances, this bill would have been passed last Friday evening. If the case were one of fifty there would be no trouble in passing it. If it were even one of a thousand, probably there would be no trouble in passing this special act, and by a series of such acts all widows in like circumstances would be pensioned. But there are not only hundreds, but thousands of cases just as meritorious as this, and the very moment this bill is passed they will be sending in their applications to be pensioned by special acts.

Now, let the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions be as zealous in this matter as he usually is in all matters connected with pensions, and we shall succeed in passing during this Congress a general law providing for all cases of this class. Let him introduce to-morrow, or at some early day, a general bill, and let us have a general act passed in favor of every soldier's widow in the land who, after having remarried, has again become a widow. I will vote for such an act; but when the chairman of this committee says that this case is not to be made a precedent, I want to know whether we are to consider ourselves as thereby notified that we need not bring other bills of this character before his committee and expect a favorable report.

Mr. PICKLER. My remark was that this case would not be a precedent for all other cases; that if we passed this bill, it does not follow that we shall pass every other bill of this kind.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I observe that the report of the committee in this case states that after carefully considering the bill, and in view of the facts recited, they recommend that the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" be stricken out and the words "at the rate of $12 a month" be substituted. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], who fathers this bill, asked, I believe, in his extreme modesty, a pension of only $8 a month in this case. If this woman were entitled to a pension under the general law, she would get but $8 a month; but it appears that in this and many other cases which have been reported, the fact appearing that the applicant is not entitled to a pension under the general law, it is proposed in these special bills to grant pensions in excess of the amount which would be received under the general law—to the extent of $12, $15, and in some cases $20 a month. In all cases the committee does not pursue this course.

On last Friday night, although the committee passed one bill pensioning a dependent daughter at the rate of $12 a month, there were two cases where there was presumptive evidence of the death of the soldier—where he had been absent for twenty-five or thirty years without being heard from, so that the common-law requirement as to proof of death was complied with. This generous committee gave the widows in those cases, who were clearly entitled to pensions under the intent of law, only the amount of pension they would receive under the law. But it appears that if there is no law reaching the case, then the generosity of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is exercised, and they propose to put their hands into the public Treasury and to say, "We, the guardians of the Treasury, propose to dispense the public money to the people who are making their applications here such sums as we see fit."

Now, I put the question in all seriousness, is this a proper and just course of policy to pursue? I put the question to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is it proper and just that when you put on the pension roll a woman who clearly is not entitled to a pension under the law, you should say that she shall receive a greater pension than a person clearly entitled to a pension within the full meaning and intent of the law?

Mr. LAYTON. I wish to say on behalf of the minority of the committee that we have opposed that course in every instance.

Mr. LOUD. I trust that the gentleman from New York who introduced this bill, and who in doing so was modest enough to ask only a pension of $8 a month, will now ask that this amendment be not adopted.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am perfectly willing to accept the gentleman's suggestion. I am quite willing to have this bill passed without the amendment, so that this lady shall be pensioned "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws." When the vote comes upon the amendment, I shall be very glad to ask that it be not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by the committee, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. Is there objection?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

The question being taken,

The CHAIRMAN said: The ayes seem to have it.

A division being called for, the question was again taken, and there were—ayes 70, noes 8.

Mr. MILES. No quorum.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. This is a matter which so far as general legislation is concerned is in charge of the Pensions Committee, and while I am personally willing to withdraw the bill, I prefer to have the decision of the chairman of the committee on that matter.

Mr. PICKLER. The bill will not be withdrawn with the consent of the committee. I am surprised that members of the committee make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MILES. You will be surprised a great many times at the exercise of what I consider to be proper courage.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the vote be announced, so that it may be determined whether there is a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes were 70, the noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that if the Chairman will make a count under the rules a quorum will be found present. A number of members did not vote.

Several MEMBERS. Call the roll.

Mr. MILES. I want to say in reply to the remark which fell from the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota——

Mr. PICKLER. I call the gentleman to order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MILES. Then the gentleman himself was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order and will take his seat.

After a pause,

The CHAIRMAN (having made a count of the Committee of the Whole) said: No quorum is present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. I heard gentlemen asking to have their names recorded after the roll call, and while I would not undertake to suggest anything to the Chair, knowing his ability and experience, I thought probably it may not have been noticed by him. I think the rule does not allow members to have their names entered after the roll has been called. I simply make the suggestion, however.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of pension bills, a number of which are on the Calendar and will probably be unobjected to, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the call be vacated and the bill under consideration be withdrawn for the present.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. MILES. The request was made and objected to by the gentleman who expressed such woolly surprise at my conduct.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that the committee now rise and report to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole had found itself without a quorum, whereupon he had directed the Clerk to call the roll, upon which 100 members had answered to their names, and he now reported the list of absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The names of the absentees will be entered on the Journal. It appearing that a quorum is present, under clause 2 of Rule XXIII, the committee will resume its sitting, and the gentleman from Iowa will again take the chair.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its sitting.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Has the name of Mr. FITZGERALD been recorded as present?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman has been recorded as present.

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, that is a mistake. I understand that he is ill and in Nashville.

Mr. HARDY. If you are not Mr. FITZGERALD you have no right to inquire.

Mr. ERDMAN. I think I have.

Mr. MILES. It is pertinent to know who did answer to his name. I desire to know, as a matter of privilege, who answered for him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a question of privilege.

Mr. MEREDITH. It certainly is a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, or at least it ought to be.

Mr. MILES. This gentleman sits here right by my seat; he has been an invalid for three weeks; and to my personal knowledge has not been here for that length of time. When the name was called some one answered, and it is certainly a question of privilege to know who answered to his name.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it appearing beyond any question that the name of Mr. FITZGERALD had been recorded as present, when it is known to the members of the House and to myself personally that he has been here but once during the whole session of the House, and is now absent on account of sickness, that a quorum did not appear to be present, and we can not go on and do business without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. But members have come in since that.

Mr. MEREDITH. But does not the question at issue go further than that?

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has suggested to the House that there was no quorum present. Let me make this statement. Mr. FISCHER, who sits next to me, answered immediately after his name was called, and just as the Clerk was calling the name of Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt that in that manner the inaccuracy resulted. Mr. FISCHER should be recorded as present and Mr. FITZGERALD absent.

Mr. PICKLER. He did not answer to Mr. FITZGERALD'S name, but to his own. We have a quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 17, noes 64.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. I made this motion that the committee rise for the purpose of determining whether a quorum is present.

Mr. MEREDITH. Before my friend takes his seat, I wish to say that I think the question which arose just now goes further than the mere question of no quorum. Somebody—inadvertently, I hope—answered to the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. NORTHWAY. That has been explained. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISCHER] answered to his name when the name of Mr. FITZGERALD had been reached, and the Clerk recorded it as Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. THOMAS. And Mr. FISCHER'S name was not checked off on the roll.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. FISCHER'S name was not checked off, but Mr. FITZGERALD'S was.

Mr. MEREDITH. I did not understand that that explanation had been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is only able to count 99 members present. The committee finding itself without a quorum, the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. FISCHER (when his name was called). Mr. Chairman, I understand my presence here has been questioned. On the previous roll call, when I answered, the name of Mr. FITZGERALD had been reached by the Clerk, but to make it certain now, I make the statement, in order that the matter may be understood. I was present then, and am present now, and I answered for myself, and not for Mr. FITZGERALD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE) having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Clerk to call the roll, and he asked that the Clerk report the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the names of the absentees.

The Clerk reported the names of those members who failed to respond.

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. TERRY, went home this afternoon, sick. He said nothing about being excused to-night, but I know that he is sick, and I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It appears that there are 107 members present.

Mr. PICKLER. That is a quorum in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the committee will resume its session, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will take the chair.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid over for this evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside for this evening.

Mr. CROWTHER and others objected.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. LACEY. Then I move that the bill be laid aside until next Friday evening.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand that the question be taken on the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN and others demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 2.

Mr. ERDMAN and Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting the committee). One hundred and one gentlemen are now in the Hall; a quorum is present.

Mr. TALBERT. I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "Announce the vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation the ayes are 83, the noes 2. The ayes have it, and the bill is laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

MARTHA BROOKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Martha Brooks, dependent mother of John M. Brooks, late of Company L, Second Regiment Nebraska Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks, submit the following report:

Martha Brooks, the claimant, is the mother of John M. Brooks, deceased, who was a private soldier in Company L, Second Regiment of Nebraska Cavalry Volunteers. Said Martha Brooks was a widow when her son John M. Brooks enlisted, and remained and still is a widow. John M., the soldier, was her only child and her sole support. He remitted a portion of his pay to his mother during the period of his service. The mother was poor, having no property or income from any source, and since the death of the soldier has earned her living by manual labor, except as she has been assisted by friends.

The soldier enlisted in March, 1863, at the age of 16 years, and was discharged in January, 1864. He was in poor health at the time of his discharge. He made his home with his mother from the time of his discharge until his death, which occurred in Brown County, Kans. The mother is now 83 years of age, is unable to work, and depending entirely upon others for support.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "twenty," in the seventh line, and inserting the word "twelve" in lieu thereof, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. LOUD. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "eight" instead of "twelve."

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this motion will not prevail. This son, as appears from the evidence filed in the Pension Office, and also by the evidence filed in the committee, was the sole support of this lady. She was a widow at the time he enlisted, has remained a widow ever since, and is now past 83 years of age.

Mr. PICKLER. Dependent mothers are never granted any less than $12 a month.

Mr. BRODERICK. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions informs me that dependent mothers are never granted less than $12 per month. I have not examined the law as to that, but she applied for a pension in the Pension Bureau in 1891. She filed all the evidence she could procure, and had the pension been allowed then she would have received more at $8 per month than she could possibly receive now if this bill were to pass and she were allowed $12 now, from the fact that she can not live many years. She failed to obtain a pension simply from the fact that she could not furnish the technical evidence required by the Department that the soldier's death was due to his service, which is required in these cases, while she did file the affidavits of two or three responsible witnesses that at the time the soldier was discharged and ever after he was in delicate health, and the presumption arises that his death was due to his army service; yet the Pension Bureau was not satisfied as to that fact. Now, I hope this amendment will not prevail. Most certainly this House will not stand upon a question of $4 per month to this mother who is now past 83 years of age.

Mr. ERDMAN. May I interrupt the gentleman before he takes his seat?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ERDMAN. Has the gentleman read the evidence?

Mr. BRODERICK. I have carefully read the evidence filed in the Pension Office, and also the evidence filed with the committee. I know personally some of the circumstances in the case, although this applicant does not reside in my county. This lady is poor, and a number of her neighbors whom I know personally have written me that she has no property whatever; that she had none at the time her son enlisted, and that he remitted a portion of his pay during the time he was in the service. He made his home with her after he was discharged, and helped to support her up to the time of his last illness.

Mr. ERDMAN. That is not the point of my question. The question is as to the evidence showing where the disability was acquired. Do you say that from your reading of the evidence you are of the opinion that probably the disability was acquired during the war?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir. I say that the evidence tends to show that fact. There are two affidavits filed stating that the soldier was in delicate health at the time he was discharged and never recovered his health afterwards. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to the amendment of the committee, to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment suggested by the committee, to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

KATE A. PITMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Kate A. Pitman, widow of George Pitman, late a private in Company C, One hundred and second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her $12 per month, the same to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman, respectfully report:

The husband of this widow, George Pitman, served as private in Company C, One hundred and second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, from August, 1862, to June, 1865, and from January 25, 1867, to January 25, 1870, in Company B, Forty-fifth United States Regulars. Mrs. Pitman married this soldier in 1872 and lived with him in Mansfield, Ohio, until his death, in 1879. They have two children, both daughters. Her claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office on September 28, 1873, on the ground "that after a special examination the evidence fails to show lawful marriage to soldier. Death of former wife not shown."

There is no question but that this woman was legally married to this soldier, if he had no other wife living when the marriage was solemnized.

The only evidence of a former marriage was the fact that a license to marry had been issued to the soldier and a woman from the probate judge of Montgomery County, Ohio.

There was no record found anywhere that the marriage had been consummated. The laws of Ohio require every officer or minister to make a return, and that return to be recorded. This license seems to have been taken out while the soldier was on his way from the service to his home in Mansfield, Ohio.

A comrade who testifies that he was with the soldier on his way home, makes affidavit that there was no marriage of Pitman to this woman. It seems that the soldier picked up this woman and lived with her a short time. After Pitman and this woman lived together a short time, the evidence shows a man came from the South, claimed her as his wife, and she went away with him and has never been heard of since.

In no court would the evidence upon which the Pension Office rejected this widow's claim be received as sufficient to establish a prior marriage and render illegal the marriage between Pitman and his widow.

The passage of the bill giving her $12 a month is therefore recommended.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "twelve" before the word "dollars" and insert "eight." Now, sir, I do not believe there is anyone on the floor of this House who has the courage to claim that this soldier died in consequence of his services during the war. If there is any such here, I would like to see the color of his hair.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from California that the evidence in the Pension Bureau shows that this soldier did die from disabilities originally incurred in the service, and there was no question made in the Bureau on that point. The claim was rejected because a special examiner, or one of those detectives that they send out through the country, found that a license had been issued for the marriage of this man and woman in Ohio, but that there was no evidence that they had ever been legally married. There was no question in the Bureau that the man had died from disabilities incurred in the service. Now, if that will satisfy the gentleman from California he ought to withdraw his amendment, because in such a case as this under the general law the applicant would be entitled to $12 a month.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that as a general rule some evidence of the character just stated by the gentleman ought to be submitted to the House when a case of this kind is presented for consideration. I wish to call attention to the fact, however, that this soldier was well enough some years after the war to pass a most critical physical examination for admission to service in the Regular Army, and, on the whole, I think it is very evident from the report that he could not have suffered seriously from any service that he rendered to the country during the war. It is just possible, of course, that he may have died from arduous services rendered after the war around New York or at some of the other United States barracks. [Laughter.]

However, the point I wish to impress upon the member advocating this bill, and upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is, that if there is anything in this case tending to show that this man really died from disabilities incurred in the service, in justice to the House that evidence ought to be laid before us; and I would like to hear now what evidence the gentleman has to offer tending to show that this soldier's death did result from disabilities incurred in the service.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LOUD, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 66.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 14 and the noes are 66. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the point of no quorum. [After a count.] Ninety-three gentlemen are in the Hall, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Who made the point of no quorum?

Mr. ERDMAN. I made the point. I desire to have settled the question whether we will give greater pensions to widows by special bills than we give by the general law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following-named members failed to respond:

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee having found itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, and that the Clerk would report the names of absentees.

The Clerk then read the names as above.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll call discloses the presence of 104 members.

Mr. PICKLER. Do I understand that there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is. Under the rule the Committee of the Whole will resume its sitting. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HEPBURN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

Mr. PICKLER. That is the amendment on which we voted. The roll having been called, and the presence of a quorum disclosed, that motion is now carried.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from California. [The question was put.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I call for a division.

Several MEMBERS. This is the question we voted on before.

Mr. CROWTHER. I rise to a question of order—that this question has already been settled by a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; it has not been settled. When the question was taken before, the ayes were 14 and the noes 66. The point of no quorum was raised, and it appeared on a count that no quorum was present.

Mr. PICKLER. But the roll call just taken has disclosed that a quorum was present.

The CHAIRMAN. It disclosed that a quorum is present now, but it did not disclose that a quorum was present at that time.

Mr. PICKLER. The roll call disclosed that there was a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was unable to count a quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. It seems to me the motion is already carried.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. We have once voted on this question, and the vote was announced. Then we proceeded to find out whether there was a quorum, and it appeared that there was a quorum present when that vote was taken.

Mr. GROUT. Not when that vote was taken.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think I am stating this point of order.

Mr. GROUT. You are not stating the facts.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have the floor at any rate, whether I am stating facts or things which are not facts. If after we have ascertained the presence of a quorum we are to take the vote again, and then have that vote doubted and a division called for, and the point of no quorum again raised, we may go on with the proceeding all night. The Chair has once counted the Committee of the Whole and announced that there was no quorum present. But we have ascertained by the roll call that there is a quorum present. If that fact is not ascertained there was no use in calling the roll. The next question, therefore, I submit, is whether this bill shall be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. There can not be any doubt that the decision of the Chair is correct. When the vote was taken on this question before the committee divided, and it was ascertained that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. PICKLER. But there was a quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. Some gentleman raised the question of a quorum. The Chairman, under the rule, counted the members present and found there was no quorum present. Then, not for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum, but for the purpose of making report to the House, the Chair directed the roll to be called, and on that call it appeared there were 104 members present. There is no question that we go back now to take the vote on the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the question, and overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I demand a division on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from California.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 10, noes 69.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum,

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Now, we may keep on with this proceeding all night.

Mr. PICKLER. We are now within ten minutes of the time at which we must necessarily adjourn. While I regret very much that we are unable to proceed—and this is not the first evening that filibustering has defeated pension legislation—I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2800) to pension Martha Brooks, had directed that it be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation; and that the committee, having also had under consideration the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan B. Wright, had directed that it be reported to the House with an amendment and with the recommendation that as amended the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill in order.

The Clerk read by title the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan B. Wright.

Mr. ERDMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The noes seem to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I call for a division.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask whether it is now competent to take up bills reported from the Committee of the Whole with favorable recommendation. So far as the record appears, we now have a quorum, have we not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the report of the committee is concerned.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I call for the regular order, so that the bills which have been favorably reported from the Committee of the Whole may be put on their passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the motion to adjourn is in order, and the House was dividing on that question.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman on the other side insist on his call for a division?

Mr. ERDMAN. I insist that there must be a quorum of the House in order to pass that bill granting a pension to a remarried widow of a soldier.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman insists on his call for a division, we will have a vote on the motion.

Mr. ERDMAN. I insist.

The question being again taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 13, noes 69.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PICKLER. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright.

The question being taken on engrossment and third reading of the bill, on a division, demanded by Mr. ERDMAN, there were—ayes 67, noes 12.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
